13. "It is basic that no showing merely of a rational relationship to some colorable State interest would suffice; in this highly sensitive constitutional area, 'only the gravest abuses, endangering paramount interests, give occasion for permissible limitation' * * *." (p. 406, 83 S.Ct. p. 1795).
At p. 407, 83 S.Ct. at p. 1795 the Court referred to the "asserted state interest" and concluded that "*Nor * * * would the record appear to sustain it.*" (emphasis added)

14. "It cannot be questioned that the governmental purpose upon which the municipalities rely is a fundamental one. No power is more basic to the ultimate purpose and function of a government than is the power to tax. * * * But governmental action does not automatically become reasonably related to the achievement of a legitimate and substantial governmental purpose by mere assertion in the preamble of the ordinance. When it is shown that state action threatens significantly to impinge upon constitutionally protected freedom it becomes the duty of this Court to determine whether the action bears a reasonable relationship to the achievement of the governmental purpose asserted as its justification." (p. 524, 80 S.Ct. p. 417)

15. "Strict scrutiny [of state sterilization law] is essential * * *."

Defendants urge again and again in their brief, and the majority of this court accept, the proposition that we are here dealing with a statute whose purpose is the protection of "human life." If this is true it is certainly not apparent from the statute itself. Unlike, for example, the Wisconsin statute,[16] which specifically refers to the "life" of an unborn "child," and defines "unborn child" as "a human being from the time of conception until it is born alive," the Louisiana statute makes no reference to "human life;" it refers only to the "embryo or fetus."[17] In Wisconsin the crime of abortion consists of "intentionally destroy[ing] the life of an unborn child." (emphasis added) In Louisiana, on the other hand, the crime consists of performing various acts on a "female" for the "purpose of procuring premature delivery." (emphasis added). Thus in Wisconsin no crime is committed unless the life of the fetus is actually terminated. In Louisiana, "[The abortion statute] does not use the word 'attempt,' but penalizes the felonious administration of any drug, potion, or anything to any woman, for the purpose of procuring abortion or premature delivery, and prescribes only one penalty. Hence Section 807 makes no distinction between the attempt and the actual procurement of abortion or premature delivery." State of Louisiana v. Mauvezin, 136 La. 746, 67 So. 816 (1915) (emphasis added). So far as I have been able to determine, abortion is the only crime in Louisiana in which there is no distinction between an attempt and commission of the substantive crime.[18] (Indeed the "attempt" in Louisiana is the substantive crime). In past versions of the statute the subject of an abortion was a "pregnant"[19] female; in 1964 the legislature decided that any "female" would do. Finally, it is not even certain whether an intent to terminate fetal life is necessary for a conviction under the Louisiana statute. The 1870 statute, as

16. Wis.Stat. § 940.04:
"(1) Any person, other than the mother, who intentionally destroys the life of an unborn child may be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 3 years or both.
(2) Any person, other than the mother, who does either of the following may be imprisoned not more than 15 years:
(a) intentionally destroys the life of an unborn quick child; or * * *
(6) In this section 'unborn child' means a human being from the time of conception until it is born alive." (emphasis added)

17. Compare La.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14:29, entitled "Homicide," which provides in part:
"Homicide is the killing of a human being * * *." (emphasis added) and La.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14:30, entitled "Murder," which reads in part:
"Murder is the killing of a human being * * * [with specific intent to kill] * * * whoever commits the crime of murder shall be punished by death."

18. Compare La.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14:27, entitled "Attempt," which provides in part:
"Any person who, having a specific intent to commit a crime, does or omits an act for the purpose of or tending directly toward the accomplishing of his object is guilty of an attempt to commit the offense intended; * * *
Whoever attempts to commit any crime shall be punished as follows:
(1) If the offense so attempted is punishable by death or life imprisonment he shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not more than twenty years;
(2) If the offense so attempted is theft or receiving stolen things, he shall be fined not more than two hundred dollars, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both;
(3) In all other cases he shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, in the same manner as for the offense attempted; but such fine or imprisonment shall not exceed one-half of the largest fine, or one-half of the longest term or imprisonment prescribed for the offense so attempted, or both."

19. The 1942 version of the statute, La.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14:87, read in pertinent part:
"* * * (1) Administration of any drug [etc.] * * * to a pregnant female; or
(2) Use of any instrument [etc] * * * on a pregnant female, * * *" (emphasis added) amended, La.Acts, 1888, No. 24,[20] prohibited certain acts with intent to procure an "abortion" or "premature delivery". (emphasis added). Today the statute does not even use the word "abortion" but simply the broader term "premature delivery."

Thus the Wisconsin statute at least purports to emphasize the life of the fetus; the Louisiana statute focuses more on an intent to interfere with nature irrespective of the fate of the fetus (or indeed of whether there even is a fetus). Along with "prostitution," "crimes against nature," etc. the crime of abortion in Louisiana is an "Offense Affecting Sexual Immorality"[21] rather than an "Offense Against The Person."[22] The provision of the Criminal Code immediately following Abortion, entitled "Distribution of Abortifacients,"[23] provides one penalty for distribution of abortifacients or contraceptives[24] (Cf. Baird v. Eisenstadt, 1 Cir., 1970, 429 F.2d 1398: "We are led inevitably to the conclusion that * * * it is contraceptives per se that are considered immoral * * *.")[25]

20. "Whoever shall feloniously administer, or cause to be administered, any drug, potion, or any other thing, to any woman for the purpose of procuring a premature delivery, or whoever shall administer, or cause to be administered, to any woman pregnant with child, any drug, potion, or any other thing, for the purpose of procuring abortion or a premature delivery, or whoever by any means whatsoever shall feloniously procure abortion or premature delivery, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than one nor more than ten years." (emphasis added)

23. La.Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14:88.

24. "We call your attention to Act 95 of 1920, [the predecessor of the present Abortifacient Statute, note 19 supra] which is an Act to prohibit the printing or publishing of an advertisement of any secret drug for the use of females for the procurement of abortion or prevention of conception * * * We are therefore of the opinion that birth control in any form would fall within the criminal statutes now in force in this state."

The framers of the 1942 Criminal Code were aware of this interpretation of the law at the time they re-enacted it, see Morrow, The Louisiana Criminal Code of 1942—Opportunities Lost and Challenges Yet Unanswered, 17 Tul.L.Rev. 1, 22 (1942) (Morrow was one of the principal reporters of the Code).

25. H. L. A. Hart has distinguished between "public" and "private" morality in the criminal law. "Public" morality involves actions that are harmful independent of their repercussion on the general moral code. Rape is an example. "Private" morality involves actions that are not harmful to others but offensive to prevailing (or sometimes not so prevailing) moral feelings. Examples are fornication or consenting homosexuality. As Hart puts it, a particular practice violates private morality "if the thought of it makes the man on the Clapham omnibus sick." 62 Listener 162, 163 (July 30, 1959).

In John Stuart Mill's view government has no business enacting private morality into the criminal law:

"The only purpose for which power can be rightfully exercised over any member of a civilised community against his will is to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is not sufficient warrant."

On Liberty.

The British government has adopted Mill's position. See Report of the Committee on Homosexual Offenses and Prostitution (Wolfenden Report) 9–10, 20–21, 24, 79–80 (1957). So has the American Model Penal Code, see Tentative Draft No. 4, Comments to Article 207, Sexual Offenses. In the United States, however, courts often affirm—almost always in dictum—the propriety of statutes against fornication, etc. See e. g., Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 498–499, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965) (concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg). But where fundamental rights are involved, as they are in this case, private morality alone cannot justify their abridgment:

"The mere assertion that the action of the State finds justification in the controversial realm of morals cannot justify alone any and every restriction it im-

Concern for the protection of human life, then, is hardly manifest from the face of the statute.[26] In actual operation the statute fares even worse. Since 1870, when the abortion law was first enacted, there have been no more than four reported decisions of prosecutions.[27] There are only two reported prosecutions subsequent to 1955. All of these prosecutions are against the "criminal" abortionist; as against the physician there are no reported decisions of prosecutions.[28]

Perhaps even more revealing, however, is the fact that the woman who submits to abortion is guilty of no criminal offense:

> "It is true that a female who voluntarily becomes the subject of an abortion, without justifiable medical reason, is guilty of a detestible and revolting offense against the laws of nature, which is universally condemned, but notwithstanding this, such woman is not guilty of any criminal offense known to the laws of this state." Payne v. Louisiana Ind. Life Ins. Co., 33 So.2d 444 (Orleans Ct. App.1948)

This is true even in the case where the woman intentionally aborts herself. Simmons v. Victory Indus. Life Ins. Co., supra. It may be argued that the reason for exempting the mother is to encourage her to testify against the "abortionist." But surely this puts the cart before the horse. Suppose, for example, that A hires B to kill C; would the State poses." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 545, 81 S.Ct. 1752, 1778, 6 L.Ed.2d 989 (1961) (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Harlan). See also Baird v. Eisenstadt, supra.

26. Both parties seek to show the State's interest or lack of it in the fetus by pointing to various succession laws. One statute, for example, says that children in the womb are considered as already born and that an inheritance may "devolve" to them before their birth. La.Civ.Code Ann. Art. 29. See also La.Civ.Code Ann. Art. 954. But the right to inherit does not vest unless or until the child is "born alive," La.Civ.Code Ann. Arts. 956-957, and "children born dead are considered as if they had never been born or conceived." La.Civ.Code Ann. Art. 28.

In my view the succession laws are of doubtful relevancy to the abortion statute; at any rate they are too contradictory to support the argument of either party.

27. State of Louisiana v. Sharp, 248 La. 865, 182 So.2d 517 (1966); State of Louisiana v. Pailet, 246 La. 483, 165 So. 2d 294 (1964); State of Louisiana v. Dore, 227 La. 282, 79 So.2d 309 (1955); State of Louisiana v. Mauvesin, 136 La. 746, 67 So. 816 (1915).

Compare the "Gambling" statute, La. Rev.Stat.Ann. § 14:90, under which there have been at least 50 reported prosecutions. "Sodomy" (Abortion's bedmate in the Code) has even resulted in a greater number of reported prosecutions.

28. The absence of reported cases is not the only evidence of failure to prosecute the physician:

> "The lack of enforcement was noted in 1868, H. Storer & F. Heard, Criminal Abortion 136-147 (1868), and has continued to the present, see L. Lader, Abortion 70-73 (1966); Ziff, Recent Abortion Law Reforms (Or Much Ado About Nothing) 60 J.Crim.L.C. & P.S. 3, 8 (1969)." 118 U.Pa.L.Rev. 647, 657, n. 87 (1969).

Speaking of the considerations that Dr. Belous might have weighed in deciding whether or not to perform an abortion in California one writer could blithely conclude "Considering the fact that the possibility of criminal prosecution and loss of practice is rarely realized. * * *" Id.

And here in Louisiana Professor C. J. Morrow, to whom defendants refer in their brief as "one of the principal redactors of the Criminal Code," has observed as a fact what the lack of reported prosecutions reflect:

> "It is common knowledge that abortions of all types are performed every day, and that there are no criminal prosecutions. This is true because there is obviously common popular acceptance of the practice, in spite of the theoretical disapproval in some quarters. However the tremendously unfortunate aspect of the situation is that under the present state of the law doctors are forced into either open defiance of the positive law in what they deem to be justifiable cases, or into clandestine practice under substandard conditions." Morrow, The Louisiana Criminal Code of 1942—Opportunities Lost and Challenges Yet Unanswered, 17 Tul.L.Rev. 1, 22 (1942) (emphasis added).

grant A immunity in exchange for his testimony against B? If abortion is truly regarded as the destruction of human life, the mother is the principal criminal; the "abortionist" is merely her paid executioner. If the State really means to protect the life of the fetus why does it fail to deter the person most directly responsible for taking it? Save for the instigation of the mother the "criminal abortionist" would not exist. Finally, why is the woman who aborts herself immune? Perhaps it will be argued that otherwise she may be afraid to seek medical help if injury results; but this proves only that the health of the mother is considered more important than the preservation of the fetus.[29]

The conclusions I draw from the foregoing facts are as follows:

(1) In practice the efforts of the State on behalf of the fetus belie the claim of a compelling state interest. Abortion actually occurs on a massive scale in the United States—estimates run between one and three million per year. Yet there is no significant attempt at deterrence. "Lamented" by some, "decried" by others, the fact remains that the phenomenon of abortion is ignored by most. The fetus in Louisiana is shielded neither from mother nor physician by the criminal law; rather the mother is shielded (rather imperfectly) from the quack. Abortion is thus a singular "crime" in our law; it is a crime without a criminal. A poor person who may steal for the most pressing human needs is branded as a "thief" and punished by the criminal law—often severely. This comes as no surprise: Our society holds the institution of private property in high regard; he who tampers with it does so at his peril. A mother, however, may take the life of her fetus at pleasure so far as the criminal law is concerned. In practice, so may a licensed physician. Surely the remarks of Mr. Justice Frankfurter in the Connecticut Birth Control case are relevant here:

> "* * * The undeviating policy of nullification by Connecticut of its anti-contraceptive laws throughout all the long years that they have been on the statute books bespeaks more than prosecutorial paralysis. * * * Deeply embedded traditional ways of carrying out state policy * * *—or not carrying it out—are often tougher and truer law than the dead words of the written text." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 502, 81 S.Ct. 1752, 1755, 6 L.Ed.2d 989 (1961)

(2) The statute is irrational and self-contradictory, a menace to public health without serving any compensating public need. As previously noted prosecution seems to be almost exclusively against the quack and not the physician. Since the crime, qua fetus, is equally great when committed by a physician the enforcement of the statute manifests little or no concern for the fetus but rather an overriding concern for the protection of the safety and health of the mother. Yet the menace to public health is clearly the product of the statute itself. The statute's primary effect is not to prevent or deter abortion, see "Conclusion (1)," supra, but simply to make it unsafe. Can it be said that there is a "reasonable relation between the prohibition * * * and the protection of the public health, education and welfare"? Sperry & Hutchinson Co. v. Director, 307 Mass. 408, 418, 30 N.E.2d 269, 275 (1940), or that the statute "bears a reasonable relation to a proper legislative purpose * * *." Nebbia v. New York, 291 U.S. 502, 537, 54 S.Ct. 505, 516, 78 L.Ed 940 (1934); Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399–400, 43 S.Ct. 625, 67 L.Ed. 1042 (1923)?

29. Compare the child battering cases. One of the reasons heavy penalties sometimes are not imposed is to encourage the child batterer to seek medical help for the child. Thus low penalties are no indication that the crime is taken lightly but rather that the need to protect the welfare of the child is balanced against the need to punish the child batterer. In the situation where the mother aborts herself, however, if any balance is struck it is struck in favor of the mother, not the child.

(3) The statute inflicts cruel and unusual punishment on the mother and violates equal protection of the law. As pointed out, the State does not attempt to deter abortion by imposition of criminal sanctions directly on the principal actor—the mother. At the same time, however, it makes it illegal for anyone else to perform an abortion. This of course has the effect of raising the price of abortion at all levels of skill. Thus to the extent that the statute deters the mother, it does so only by putting safe abortion beyond her means or by making her risk serious bodily injury at the hands of a relatively low-priced unskilled abortionist.

In Baird v. Eisenstadt, supra., the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit held that it was impermissible for Massachusetts, through its anti-contraceptive law, to pursue a policy of deterring fornication "by making the penalty a personally, and socially, undesired pregnancy." The present case is probably distinguishable from Baird. I do not think the legislature intended[30] to encourage women to risk their health and lives; but because the statute makes abortion illegal for everyone but the mother it works precisely that result.

This purposeless suffering which the statute brings about is made all the more intolerable by the fact that its victims are primarily the poor:

> "The present law places an unfair discrimination on the poor in that persons with money may obtain safe abortions either by travelling to other jurisdictions, by going to high priced competent though illegal abortionists, or by obtaining legal abortions here based on 'sophisticated indications.'" Report of the Governor's Commission Appointed to Review New York State's Abortion Laws, 17 (Mar.1968)

Deaths and maiming from abortion by nonmedical means such as soaps, chemicals, knitting needles, coathangers, etc., appear to be the basic if not the exclusive property of the non-white poor. Gold,[31] for example, shows that between 1960–62 in New York City abortion accounted for 55.5%, 49.4% and 25.2% respectively of the Puerto Rican, nonwhite and white puerperal death rates. Gold does not report figures for injury short of death, but one can imagine the toll they must take in the ghetto.

30. But see defendant's brief: "Plaintiff also argues that the statute prohibiting abortions forces women to take 'coat hangers and knitting needles' * * * and that this could be corrected by repealing or holding the statute unconstitutional. It is argued that forcing women to go to unskilled abortionists is more of a danger to their health. This is a specious argument. It is neither necessary nor proper for society to remove obstacles that are in the way of the criminal in order to make it easier to commit the crime." (emphasis added)

31. Gold, Erhardt, Jacobziner & Nelson, Therapeutic Abortions in New York City: A Twenty Year Review, 55 Am.J.Pub. Health 964 (1965); see also Note, Abortion and the Law: A Proposal for Reform in Louisiana, 43 Tul.L.Rev. 834, 836–837 (1969):

> "Because the demand for abortion cannot be met within the existing legal framework, illegal means are increasingly employed. For an affluent woman, able to pay a fee of $300 to $600, skilled physicians willing to work outside the law are available. [Citing Time, vol. 90, Oct. 13, 1967 at 33] Indeed in Miami alone abortionists collected $20,000,000 for their services in 1967 * * * [citing Time, supra].
> Since hospital abortions are generally unavailable to precisely those persons who are unable to afford the expensive and illegal private abortions the less affluent are forced to resort to the unskilled. [citing L. Lader, Abortion (1967)] Obviously the greater proportion of the more than 1,000 deaths annually due to abortions [citing Time, supra] occur among these expectant mothers. However, the annual death toll is only a small part of the social cost of such a system. To the death toll must be added thousands of women crippled by infection, thousands whose sexual organs are damaged so that they are unable to achieve normal sexual satisfaction, and thousands rendered irreversibly barren [citing Time, supra]. These, then, are the results of the prevailing American solution to the problems posed by abortion."

If the penalty is built-into the statute, so is the discrimination. Cf. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 503, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510 (1965);[32] Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942).[33] See also note 31, supra. By making abortion legal for the mother, but illegal for anyone else, the statute's sole effect on the mother is to raise the price of abortion. Abortion becomes less available to the degree to which one is not able to afford the "tax." For some the higher price is not an obstacle; for others it is either prohibitive, or, to the extent to which forces them to go to the less skilled practitioners (or to abort themselves), highly dangerous. If criminal sanctions were applied to well-off and poor women alike (not just in theory but in practice), as well as to the "abortionist," the increased price of abortion would be an additional (as well as unavoidable) deterrent, but not the only one. But the Louisiana statute does not deter rich and poor alike by equal application of the criminal law; it simply makes safe abortion less available to the poor than it would otherwise be. The person with means remains perfectly free to procure a high-priced safe abortion without fear of criminal sanction. This discrimination is therefore far more than an unequal side-effect of an otherwise equal law. The law itself is unequal. It is a direct discrimination against the poor, a gross violation of this country's "pledge of the protection of equal laws." Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 369, 68 S.Ct. 1064, 1070, 30 L.Ed. 220 (1886). Moreover, since the discrimination affects the most fundamental human rights —either by denying abortion to the poor altogether or by subjecting them unequally to risks of life and limb—"strict scrutiny * * * is essential, lest unwittingly, or otherwise invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guarantee of just and equal laws." Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942) (compulsory sterilization law) (emphasis added). See also note 32, supra. Many women lose the use of their sexual organs as a result of the abortion laws, see note 31, supra, just as did the habitual criminals in Skinner. I would hold the statute invalid on the ground of equal protection alone.

(4) The abortion statute neither has a clear purpose to protect fetal life, nor is there good reason to believe it significantly does so in fact. (except, perhaps, where the poor are concerned). See "Conclusions (1) and (3)," supra, text at notes 26–29, supra, Abortion and the Law 23 (Smith ed. 1967); Cf. Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, 381 U.S. at 498, 85 S.Ct. at 1689.[34]

These, then, are the weighty State "interests" for which the mother must suffer and, in an estimated 8,000 cases last year, die. I must dissent.[35]

32. "And the clear effect of these statutes, as enforced, is to deny disadvantaged citizens of Connecticut, those without either knowledge or resources to obtain private counseling, access to medical assistance and up-to-date information in respect to proper methods of birth control * * *. In my view, a statute with these effects bears a substantial burden of justification when attacked under the Fourteenth Amendment. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 6 S.Ct. 1064, 30 L.Ed. 220 * * * Skinner v. State of Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 62 S.Ct. 1110, [86 L.Ed. 1655] * * *." (emphasis added) (concurring opinion of Justice White)

33. "* * * strict scrutiny * * * is essential, lest unwittingly or otherwise invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guarantee of just and equal laws. * * *" (emphasis added).

34. "[The State] says that preventing the use of birth-control devices by married persons helps prevent the indulgence by some in such extra-marital relations. The rationality of this justification is dubious, particularly in light of the admitted widespread availability to all persons in the State of Connecticut, unmarried as well as married, of birth control devices * * *." (concurring opinion of Justice Goldberg).

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE SEVENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT OF THE STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA, WITHIN AND FOR PENNINGTON COUNTY

vs.
H. BENJAMIN MUNSON, Defendant

MEMORANDUM DECISION

April 6, 1970

CLARENCE P. COOPER, Circuit Judge:

"* * * most of the abortion laws were passed in the so called 'Victorian' era, a time when moral and religious fervor against anything regarded as sinful, resulted in many laws governing morals and personal conduct. The South Dakota statute dates back to 1877. Most of these laws governing personal or private conduct, like the 'blue laws' have either been repealed or have not been enforced. The laws prohibiting abortion represented a change from the common law which permitted abortion in the initial stages of pregnancy, before quickening of the fetus. * * *

"According to reliable estimates, more than a million American women had abortions last year. Of these about 350,000 needed hospital care when they attempted to abort themselves, and more than 8000 of these self-help cases died. (Life Magazine, Feb. 27, 1970) Enforcement of the abortion laws has been chiefly against quacks and charlatans who have botched the job, and the woman lived to complain. Where death ensues, the prosecution has been for homicide. It is a rare case when a licensed physician has been prosecuted. In no instances has the woman been prosecuted, although the abortion laws are directed equally against the woman seeking an abortion.

"With such massive disregard for the abortion law, reflecting a radical change in public attitude, it is in order to determine whether the exercise of the police power in prohibiting abortion is 'sanctioned by usage, held by prevailing morality to be necessary to public welfare, or endangers the vital interests of society', criteria which over the years have been used to measure the right of the State to regulate personal and private conduct. * * *" ment to be passed on as an abstract proposition. The secular state is not the examiner of consciences: it must operate in the realm of behavior of overt actions, and where it does so operate, not only the underlying, moral purpose of its operations, but also the choice of means becomes relevant to any Constitutional judgment on what is done. The moral presupposition on which appellants ask us to pass judgment could form the basis of a variety of legal rules and administrative choices, each presenting a different issue for adjudication." Mr. Justice Harlan, dissenting, Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497, 547, 81 S.Ct. 1752, 1779, 6 L.Ed.2d 989 (1961).

Item No. 28

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE COUNTY OF ST. LOUIS

STATE OF MISSOURI

SAMUEL U. RODGERS, M.D.; DAVID ROTHMAN, M.D.; DAVID HALL, M.D.; DAN L. BERGER, M.D.; RAYMOND B. BRAGG; ALVAN D. RUBIN; ROBERT H. CRAFT; GWYNDOLYN HARVEY; SUSAN HALVERSTADT; and SALLY STEINBACH, Plaintiffs, vs. JOHN C. DANFORTH, Attorney General of the State of Missouri; and GENE McNARY, Prosecuting Attorney of St. Louis County, Missouri, Defendants, and INFANT DOE; and M. H. BACKER, JR., M.D., Guardian Ad Litem, Defendant Intervenors.	Cause No. 315512 Equity Division

ORDER AND DECREE

Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment sustained.

I The Court finds and declares:

Section 559.100 of Missouri Revised Statutes unconstitutionally vague and indefinite, on its face and as applied; the statute as applied and interpreted does not give sufficient warning or guidance to plaintiffs, to Judges and to juries in answer to the question when may a pregnancy be terminated or interrupted - "unless the same be necessary to preserve her life".

A statute which is stated in terms so vague that men of ordinary intelligence must guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates "Due Process of Law".

II Section 559.100, Missouri Revised Statutes, is in deprivation of rights protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution, specifically:

(a) The right to give and to receive medical advice and treatment.

(b) The right to privacy.

(c) The right to choose whether and when to bear and rear children.

III Missouri Revised Statutes, Section 559.100, denies to plaintiffs the equal protection of the laws.

III Patients and physicians are treated differently, depending upon the local composition of the enforcing authorities and the interpretation of the phrase "unless the same is necessary to preserve her life", i.e., a pregnancy resulting from rape, incest, deformity, or one which may endanger the mental or physical health of the mother.

There is no overriding or compelling State interest to justify the differences.

The statute deprives women of their rights to determine, with their physicians, whether or not to carry a pregnancy to term.

IV Section 559.100 of the Missouri Revised Statutes is in conflict with the "Due Process of Law" under the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution in that it does not provide an official method by which a physician, patient, or hospital Theraputic Abortion Committee can obtain a timely or adequate review of a decision on the legality of an abortion.

V The moral, religious, and philosophical aspects of the law of abortion are not possible of solution or agreement. Those whose moral, religious, or philosophical convictions do not allow or provide for abortion under any circumstances may follow the dictates of their own beliefs and conscience; and those whose philosophical, moral, or religious beliefs provide otherwise may do so without fear of criminal prosecution - there being no overriding or compelling public or State interest. A different solution in my judgment would impose the will or one moral, religious and philosophical conclusion upon another in violation of the First Amendment of the United States Constitution.

WHEREFORE, the Court sustains plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment.

Item No. 29

IN THE MUNICIPAL COURT OF THE CENTRAL ORANGE COUNTY JUDICIAL DISTRICT

COUNTY OF ORANGE, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA Plaintiff vs. Dr. John Shriver Gwynne Deborah T. Dwyer Defendants	CASE 173309 OPINION June 16, 1970

Defendants, one of them a licensed practicing medical doctor, have been charged with two counts of violation of Section 274 of the Penal Code, by intentionally procuring miscarriages not in compliance with Chapter 11 of Division 20 of the Health and Safety Code.

Defendants and both of them have demurred to the complaint on the grounds that the complaint fails to state a cause of action or crime, in that Section 274 of the Penal Code and Sections 25950 and following sections of the Health and Safety Code are in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of California.

For purposes of the demurrer, the court presumes the charges in the complaint to be true.

There have as yet been no appellate decisions with respect to these sections, so the court must take up one by one the general objections raised in defendants' briefs.

To satisfy the First Amendment establishment clause, the Constitution requires a secular legislative purpose and a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion. Everson v Board of Education; McGowan v Maryland.

The stated purpose of the combination of sections in question is a medical one, purely secular. In construing legislation in California, one may look to the title, etc. Here the primary sections are placed in the Health & Safety Code and are entitled "Therapeutic" and the primary effect is upon the health of the mother, which neither advances nor inhibits her religious faith.

The Court would have handled this issue out of hand except for the fact that the greater part of argument was had in this area.

I think it appropriate, here, to say a word regarding the blatant attack made by the defense upon the Supreme Court.

A casual reading of the Belous case would satisfy even the most prejudiced man that both the opinion of Justice Peters and the dissents of J. Burke and J. Sullivan are directed entirely to the legal questions involved, particularly vagueness, and I for one can find not one scintilla of evidence to substantiate the claim of defense counsel.

I consequently believe that defense argument shows a bigotry unworthy of a court of law.

It is urged that there is no such thing as a "Right of Privacy" in a woman either under the Ninth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment, with regard to the bearing of children, etc.

Whatever the merits of this contention, the California Supreme Court has said,

> "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'Right of Privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex." People v Belous

This court is bound by that statement of law.

Therefore, to regulate in this area the State must have a compelling or overriding interest in the regulation of the subject which is within its police powers.

It has been urged in other states and cases that the State has such an interest in an unborn fetus. None has been found in California prior to viability. (Keeler v Superior Court and People v Belous) The recent Supreme Court opinion in the Keeler case may even cast doubt on the interest after viability.

However, we are not here concerned with such an interest, if any there is, because the Legislature has clearly framed the interest upon which it relies; (to-wit: the health of the mother.) The Legislature showed no interest in the unborn fetus prior to twenty weeks by permitting abortion in cases of rape and incest, etc. As Judge Mast stated in the Robb case: "If life were present at conception, abortions would not be permitted in cases of rape or incest any more than it would be permitted to terminate the life of a one-year old whose life had come as the result of rape or incest."

Regarding, then, the health of the mother as the only interest of the State involved in these statutes; the statement in People v Belous that "abortions are 'the most common single cause of maternal deaths in California,'" and "abortions early in pregnancy and properly performed present minimal danger to the woman;" along with the explanatory material cited therein, gives the State a sufficient and compelling interest in the regulation of abortion to allow the Legislature to proscribe that abortion only be done by a physician, in an accredited hospital, prior to twenty weeks and after consultation or approval of a number of staff doctors. These regulations appear to the court to be reasonable in view of the compelling interest of the State in the life and health of its women residents. To say otherwise would be to merely substitute the court's opinion for that of the Legislature and I cannot do that.

Health & Safety Code Section 25951 and subsections a and b satisfies Constitutional requirements and are valid regulations.

Sub-section c, however, prohibits abortion unless certain conditions are found to exist. Sub-section c(2) attempts to distinguish pregnancy resulting from rape and incest from other pregnancy and in doing so violates the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

"A Statute makes an improper and unlawful discrimination if it confers particular privileges upon a class arbitrarily selected from a larger number of persons, all of whom stand in the same relation to the privilege granted and between whom and persons not so favored, no reasonable distinction or substantial difference can be found justifying the inclusion of one and the exclusion of the others." Franchise Motor Freight Association v Seavey.

Classes excluded from the statute include those whose potential offspring are likely to bear grave disabilities, either mental or physical, as a result of the condition of the mother early in the pregnancy, and which are at least as compelling when viewed from the standpoint of the health and welfare of the mother as those following rape or incest. Such discrimination is improper and cannot stand. Likewise, Section 25952, which sets forth procedures to follow in cases of rape and incest, is rendered unnecessary.

I disagree with Judge Mast with regard to his application of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination to Section 25952, in view of the immunities granted therein; however, a decision in that area is not necessary in view of the basic ruling hereinbefore stated.

We come, then, to the most basic question presented. Sub-section c(1) of Section 25951 limits abortion to those cases which "gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother" or at least where there is a "substantial risk" thereof.

The Court here must balance the risks between the State interest in health and the Right of Life and Liberty in the Fourteenth Amendment.

A hospital abortion performed under clinical condition during the first semester of pregnancy is a safe and simple procedure. In fact, it is now actually safer for a woman to have a hospital abortion than to bear a child. A woman has a compelling interest in her own health and indeed in her life, as well as does the State.

This statute goes beyond protecting women from unsafe procedures and unlicensed practitioners and into the area of impermissible overbreadth.

Under police power, the state can regulate abortion, as the Court has earlier stated; however, it may not deny to a woman the basic right reserved to her under the Fourteenth Amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which has not yet reached the twentieth week. Sub-section c(1) of Section 25951 of the Health & Safety Code suffers from fatal overbreadth.

The Court believes that Section 25951 of the Health & Safety Code, Sub-sections a and b are severable from Sub-section c and may stand alone along with Section 25953

The Court, therefore, sustains the demurrer and grants the People ten days leave to amend their complaints to set forth sufficient particularities so as to give notice to defendants regarding against what they must defend themselves.

COUNTY OF ORANGE, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA)
Plaintiff)	CASE 149005 CASE 159061
v.)
ROBERT CUMMING ROBB,)	OPINION OF THE COURT Defendant)

The defendant, Robert Cumming Robb, a medical doctor licensed to practice medicine in the State of California, stands before the Court charged with felonies in four counts. The People of the State of California charge in Count I of Complaint 149005, filed September 4, 1969, that Dr. Robb violated on the twenty-sixth day of November, 1968, Section 274 of the Penal Code of the State of California in that in Orange County, California, he wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously provided, supplied and administered to Susan Klambara and procured said Susan Klambara to take medicine, drugs and substances, and use and employ an instrument and other means with intent thereby to procure a miscarriage of Susan Klambara, which was not in compliance with the Therapeutic Abortion Act, Chapter 11 of Division 20 of the Health and Safety Code of the State of California.

The People charge in Count II of said complaint a violation of the same statute on the twelfth day of August, 1969, in relation to the intentional miscarriage of Teri Ann Alesandro.

The People charge in Count I of Complaint 159061, filed December 22, 1969, violation of the same statute on the thirtieth day of October, 1969, in relation to the intentional miscarriage of Linda P. Muschetto; and in Count II of said complaint the violation of the same statute on the twenty-ninth day of November, 1969, in relation to the intentional miscarriage of Darice Lombard.

By these two complaints, which have been consolidated, the People charge Dr. Robb with four counts of abortion in violation of what is commonly referred to as the "Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967."

UGH POOR COPY COPY PRINTED CLOSE TO EDGE

The defendant, Dr. Robb, has demurred to the complaint and seeks to have the complaint dismissed on the grounds that the complaint fails to state a crime in that Penal Code Section 274 (The Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967) is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

In considering this demurrer we must, and we do, assume that the charges alleged in the complaints are true.

The "Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967," Section 274 of the Penal Code states:

> Every person who provides, supplies or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, except as provided in the Therapeutic Abortion Act, Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 25950) of Division 20 of the Health and Safety Code, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than two nor more than five years."

Chapter 11 of the Health and Safety Code stated in general that a licensed doctor may perform an abortion if:

First, the operation takes place in a hospital which is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals:

Second, the abortion is approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital, which committee is established and maintained in accordance with standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; and

Third, the Committee of the Medical Staff finds that either there is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother, or the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.

Mental health is defined as mental illness to the extent that the woman is dangerous to herself or to the person or property of others or is in need of supervision or restraint.

Further, the Act provides that upon the receipt of an application for an abortion on grounds that the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest, the Committee shall immediately notify the district attorney of the county in which the alleged rape or incest occurred, and transmit to said district attorney the affidavit of the applicant attesting to the facts establishing the rape or incest.

This is a case of first impression. There has not been any trial or appellate court in the State of California which has considered the constitutionality of the "Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967." Nor has there been any prior consideration in any of the American jurisdictions of any law similar to the present California law.

The court is mindful of the cases of People of the State of California v. Leon Phillip Belous, 71 A.C. 996, and United States of America v. Milan Vuitch, United States District Court for the District of Columbia Nos. 1043-68 and 1044-68. These two cases considered the law prior to 1967 in California, and a similar law in the District of Columbia.

People v. Belous held that the term "necessary to preserve" (the life of the woman) used in the law as it existed prior to 1967 was not sufficiently certain to satisfy the due process requirements of fundamental constitutional rights. The Court pointed out that no one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes, and that all are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands and forbids.

The Court further states that a woman has a right to life and to choose whether to bear children. The woman's right to life is involved because childbirth involves risks of death.

The right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the United States and California Supreme Courts' acknowledgment of a right of privacy or liberty in matters related to marriage, family and sex.

The Court points out that the critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the state.

The case of United States v. Vuitch considers a statute in which the phrase "as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health." The Court adopts the opinion of People v. Belous so far as the same language is considered and in addition holds the word "health" is uncertain.

Thus we see that both People v. Belous and United States v. Vuitch were decided upon the narrow grounds of ambiguity and uncertainty of the language of the statute. As such they have sidestepped and avoided the primary constitutional issues leading to the ultimate question of whether a legislature may in 1970 enact any law prohibiting the performance of an abortion by a medical doctor. The Court believes that this Court, as well as other courts, in view of the thousands and perhaps millions of lives profoundly affected by such laws, can no longer avoid, but must now face this ultimate question, as well as the specific questions relating to this particular statute. The Court will do so now.

The Act provides, among others, that a woman may obtain an abortion if her pregnancy resulted from incest. Incest is a crime punishable by imprisonment in the State Penitentiary for from one to fifty years (Penal Code Section 285). In order to qualify for an abortion under this section of the Act, a woman must admit that she has committed incest to her physician. In addition, pursuant to the statute, she must sign an affidavit that she has in fact committed incest, and naming the date the act occurred and the man with whom the act occurred. Further, the form in general use, pursuant to the Act, calls for "a true description of the events, complete with time, date and location."

The information submitted is required to be submitted to the District Attorney's Office. Of what possible use can this information be put to except for prosecution? Clearly none.

This Court will not hear the People claim that although it appears to be incriminatory on its face it in fact is not because they do not prosecute women for this offense. To do so would force the courts to declare the incest statute unconstitutional in that although apparently constitutional on its face, the practice of enforcement would be a clear violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution inasmuch as an arbitrary classification is made in practice; that is, men are treated differently than women. Both the man and the woman involved in an incestuous relationship must be treated equally.

The Court concludes, therefore, that this section violates the privilege against self-incrimination and is in violation of the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

In order for the defendant to assert as a defense this ground of unconstitutionality, must it be shown that the alleged victims in these cases became pregnant as a result of incestuous relationships? Clearly not. To require the defendant to inquire at all would be to require the violation of the Fifth Amendment protection. Thus the entire statute must fall.

Even though it is not the defendant's Fifth Amendment privilege which is being violated, he is clearly a proper person to assert the privilege in this case, in accordance with numerous recent decisions of the United States and California Supreme Courts.

The next question is whether the authority delegated by the Legislature to the Joint Commission of Accreditation of Hospitals and to the Committee of the Medical Staff of individual hospitals is a proper delegation of legislative authority. In order to be proper, definite and certain guidelines must be set forth so that the person exercising the authority knows exactly what the legislature intended, and so that the courts can review the exercise of authority.

In this statute there are virtually no established standards to limit the authority. What words of the statute there are which it might be argued set standards are so vague as to be completely meaningless. (This will be discussed further in considering the problem of vagueness.)

Improper delegation of legislative authority in the case of this statute leads to a far greater fault in the statute: The violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The cases are now clear that in considering the Equal Protection Clause we look to the practice and effect of the statute not the mere face of the statute. What is the practice and effect here? It is that there is a distinct disparity of treatment and operation of the law in different geographic areas of the state.

This can only be the result of improper delegation of legislative authority. We see that in an area which accounts for 16 per cent of the live births, 50 per cent of the abortions are performed, whereas in an area of the state which accounts for 50 per cent of the live births, 23 per cent of the abortions are performed. Such unequal treatment cannot be tolerated.

The Court finds also that there is a pronounced disparity of treatment between the rich and the poor, which is an improper, arbitrary classification, clearly violative of the Equal Protection Clause. The percentage of rejected applicants is far greater in "charity" or indigent hospitals than it is in private hospitals. The rich can "purchase," by consultation fees, letters from the necessary psychiatrists to support their applications -- the poor cannot. The result is that the rich can arrange for abortions under the present law almost at will. The poor cannot.

The Constitution of the United States does not, and the People of the United States will no longer countenance nor permit the unequal treatment of individuals based on their economic positions. All persons, regardless of their financial standing, must be treated equally, and any law not so treating them cannot stand. The time is past when this community - The United States - can or will tolerate arbitrary discrimination or unequal application of the laws.

The next issue I wish to consider is whether the statute is in any way vague or uncertain. A criminal statute must be definite and certain enough to apprise the public as to what acts are prohibited. Failing this, the statute is in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. For the most part, the statute is definite and certain. However, that part which refers to mental illness "to the extent that the woman is dangerous to herself or to the person or property of others or is in need of supervision or restraint," is completely without meaning and offers no guide whatsoever by which a person can determine what is permitted and what is prohibited. Does supervision mean in an institution, by a psychiatrist, at home? What does dangerous to herself mean? What does restraint mean? They have no meaning certain enough to apprise a person what conduct is prohibited. In addition the Court notes that these words are in the disjunctive, which compounds the vagueness.

This brings us to the primary underlying problem. Does a woman have a constitutional right to make a free choice whether or not to bear children, i.e., whether or not to have an abortion? The Constitution of the United States is strong and lasting because it was written, intentionally, in such a way as to guarantee certain basic freedoms yet to be able to expand and develop to meet changing times, attitudes and approaches. The framers of the Constitution recognized that a constitution stiff and unbending could not long endure. They, therefore, framed, and Thomas Jefferson most clearly pointed out, a Constitution which would be able to develop to protect societies of which they could not dream. We are, therefore, faced with an area which might have been proper for legislation at the inception of the laws regulating abortions in 1850, but is no longer permissible in 1970, People v. Belous, supra.

Griswold v. Connecticut, 38 U.S. 479, states quite correctly that the People of the United States have certain non-enumerated fundamental rights. That among these are a right of privacy and a right to conduct interpersonal relationships between individuals in such a manner as the individuals choose.

This Court rules, that unless the State has a compelling state interest which permits it to interfere in this area, that the total freedom of choice as to whether or not to bear children, including the unrestricted right to have an abortion, is such a fundamental right, see also People v. Belous, supra.

At the inception of the old abortion law in 1850, the State had a compelling state interest in the preservation of the health of women involved. Abortion operations were dangerous with a high incidence of infection and death resulting. Due to the advance of medical science, this is no longer true. An abortion, properly done, is one of the safest operations with virtually no incidence of fatality. There is less danger to a woman from an abortion than from carrying the pregnancy to birth. Thus this state interest is no longer present.

It has been suggested that there is a state interest in preserving the morals of the state and controlling promiscuity. Besides the obvious fact that laws such as this have no effect whatsoever on sexual attitudes of the community, the Griswold case makes it clear that private sexual relations are beyond the purview of the state. The state has no compelling interest in controlling promiscuity.

The state no longer has, if it ever had, a compelling interest in increasing the population of the state. We need not consider this argument further, as the decision is abundantly clear.

In the Barksdale matter, in view of the fact that either side might take an appeal, regardless of which way the Judge might rule, I think that the decision should be read into the record.

The defense Counsel on behalf of Dr. Barksdale filed a very thorough brief of 38 pages and went into the constitutional questions very thoroughly. He did a masterful job on the law of this case.

I was very disappointed that yesterday afternoon the District Attorney's office didn't even file a brief but handed me a copy of the brief that the Attorney General filed in People of the State of California versus Leon Phillip Belous, which doesn't pertain at all to the problem before the Court. The Belous case happened prior to the Amendments of the 1967 Abortion Act. There are many things in the Belous case that applies to the present case, but there was no brief filed on behalf of the District Attorney. Regardless of that, the Court is of the same opinion stated in the decision of Paul G. Mast, Presiding Judge of the Orange County Municipal Court, on January 9, 1970. I would like to write my own written opinion; however, in view of the time emergency in the matter of not getting the brief until yesterday afternoon I was unable to do it, but I want this in the record.

The defendant, Robert W. Barksdale, is charged with a violation of The Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967. He has demurred to the Complaint and seeks to have the Complaint dismissed on the grounds the Complaint fails to state a crime in that Penal Code Section 274 (The Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967) is in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

In considering this demurrer I must, and I do, assume that the charges alleged in the Complaint are true.

The "Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967" Section 274 of the Penal Code states:

> Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, except as provided in the Therapeutic Abortion Act, Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 25950) of Division 20 of the Health and Safety Code, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than two nor more than five years.

Chapter 11 of the Health and Safety Code stated in general that a licensed doctor may perform an abortion if:

First, the operation takes place in a hospital which is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals;

Second, the abortion is approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital, which committee is established and maintained in accordance with standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; and

Third, the Committee of the Medical Staff finds that either there is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother, or the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest.

Mental health is defined as mental illness to the extent that the woman is dangerous to herself or to the person or property of others or is in need of supervision or restraint.

Further, the Act provides that upon the receipt of an application for an abortion on grounds that the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest, the Committee shall immediately notify the district attorney of the county in which the alleged rape or incest occurred, and transmit to said district attorney the affidavit of the applicant attesting to the facts establishing the rape or incest.

This is a case of first impression. There has not been any trial or appellate court in the State of California which has considered the constitutionality of the "Therapeutic Abortion Act of 1967." Nor has there been any prior consideration in any of the American jurisdictions of any law similar to the present California law.

The court is mindful of the cases of People of the State of California vs. Leon Phillip Belous, 71 A.C. 996, and United States of America vs. Milan Vuitch, United States District Court for the District of Columbia Nos. 1043-68 and 1044-68. These two cases considered the law prior to 1967 in California, and a similar law in the District of Columbia.

People vs. Belous held that the term "necessary to preserve" (the life of the woman) used in the law as it existed prior to 1967 was not sufficiently certain to satisfy the due process requirements of fundamental constitutional rights. The Court pointed out that no one may be required at peril of life, liberty or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes, and that all are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands and forbids.

The Court further states that a woman has a right to life and to choose whether to bear children. The woman's right to live is involved because childbirth involves risks of death.

The right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the United States and California Supreme Court acknowledgment of a right of privacy or liberty in matters related to marriage, family and sex.

The Court points out that the critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the State.

The case of United States vs. Vuitch considers a statute in which the phrase "as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health." The Court adopts the opinion of People vs. Belous so far as the same language is considered and in addition holds the word "health" is uncertain.

Thus we see that both People vs. Belous and United States vs. Vuitch were decided upon the narrow grounds of ambiguity and uncertainty of the language of the statute. As such they have sidestepped and avoided the primary constitutional issues leading to the ultimate question of whether a legislature may in 1970 enact any law prohibiting the performance of an abortion by a medical doctor. The Court believes that this Court, as well as other courts, in view of the thousands and perhaps millions of lives profoundly affected by such laws, can no longer avoid, but must now face this ultimate question, as well as the specific questions relating to this particular statute. The Court will do so now.

Further, the form in general use, pursuant to the Act, calls for a "true description of the events, complete with time, date and location."

The information submitted is required to be submitted to the District Attorney's office. Of what possible use can this information be put to except for prosecution? Clearly none.

This Court will not hear the People claim that although it appears to be incriminatory on its face it in fact is not because they do not prosecute women for this offense. To do so would force the courts to declare the incest statute unconstitutional in that although apparently constitutional on its face, the practice of enforcement would be a clear violation of of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution inasmuch as an arbitrary classification is made in practice; that is, men are treated differently than women. Both the man and the woman involved in an incestuous relationship must be treated equally.

The Court concludes, therefore, that this section violates the privilege against self-incrimination and is in violation of the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

In order for the defendant to assert as a defense this ground of unconstitutionality must it be shown that the alleged victims in this case became pregnant as a result of incestuous relationships? Clearly not. To require the defendant to inquire at all would be to require the violation of the Fifth Amendment protection. Thus the entire statute must fall.

Even though it is not the defendant's Fifth Amendment privilege which is being violated, he is clearly a proper person to assert the privilege in this case, in accordance with numerous recent decisions of the United States and California Supreme Court.

Does supervision mean in an institution, by a psychiatrist, at home? What does dangerous to herself mean? What does restraint mean? They have no meaning certain enough to apprise a person what conduct is prohibited. In addition the Court notes that these words are in the disjunctive, which compounds the vagueness.

This brings us to the primary underlying problem. Does a woman have a constitutional right to make a free choice whether or not to bear children, i.e., whether or not to have an abortion? The Constitution of the United States is strong and lasting because it was written, intentionally, in such a way as to guarantee certain basic freedoms yet to be able to expand and develop to meet changing times, attitudes and approaches. The framers of the Constitution recognized that a constitution stiff and unbending could not long endure. They, therefore, framed, and Thomas Jefferson most clearly pointed out, a Constitution which would be able to develop to protect societies of which they could not dream. We are, therefore, faced with an area which might have been proper for legislation at the inception of the laws regulating abortion in 1850, but is no longer permissible in 1970, People vs. Belous, supra.

Griswold vs. Connecticut, 38 U.S. 479, states quite correctly that the People of the United States have certain non-enumerated fundamental rights. That among these are a right of privacy and a right to conduct interpersonal relationships between individuals in such a manner as the individuals choose.

This Court rules, that unless the State has a compelling state interest which permits it to interfere in this area, that the total freedom of choice as to whether or not to bear children including the unrestricted right to have an abortion, is such a fundamental right, see also People vs. Belous, supra.

At the inception of the old abortion law in 1850 the State had a compelling state interest in the preservation of the health of women involved. Abortion operations were dangerous with a high incidence of infection and death resulting. Due to the advance of medical science, this is no longer true. An abortion, properly done, is one of the safest operations with virtually no incidence of fatality. There is less danger to a woman from an abortion than from carrying the pregnancy to birth. Thus this state interest is no longer present.

It has been suggested that there is a state interest in preserving the morals of the state and controlling promiscuity. Besides the obvious fact that laws such as this have no effect whatsoever on sexual attitudes of the community, the Griswold case makes it clear that private sexual relations are beyond the purview of the state. The state has no compelling interest in controlling promiscuity.

The state no longer has, if it ever had, a compelling interest in increasing the population of the state. We need not consider this argument further, as the decision is abundantly clear.

The primary contention of compelling state interest advanced on this issue is that the law is necessary to preserve the life of the unborn. This argument will not stand the test of logic, however. When is there life present in the eyes of the law? Certainly not at conception. If there were life present at conception abortions would not be permitted in cases of rape or incest, or the other exceptions any more than it would be permitted to terminate the life of a one-year old whose life had come as the result of rape or incest. We also see no suggestions that intrauterine devices or "morning after" pills, both of which are abortive devices, are illegal.

The case of Keeler vs. Amador County Superior Court, 276 A.C.A. 324, considering the death of a 31- to 36-week fetus states that the killing of a viable fetus -- one capable of life out of the mother's womb -- (which would always occur in the third trimester of a pregnancy) can be prosecuted for murder as the killing of a human being. Before this stage, the fetus is not considered a human being or alive.

In view of these and many other examples of the law treating the embryo different from a human, we cannot permit a legislative theory which decrees that life begins at conception. To do so would be to blandly adopt the philosophy of one of the country's major religions, an act which clearly would be in violation of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution.

Thus the Court can find no compelling interest of the state, and concludes that the right to choose to bear or not to bear children is a fundamental right of the individual woman to be exercised in any manner she chooses and which may not in any way be abridged by law.

The Court concludes that the Complaint fails to state a cause of action against the defendant inasmuch as the statute is violative of the United States Constitution.

The Complaint is ordered dismissed and the defendant discharged.

I might say that I belong to the religion that was just referred to, and I dislike to render this opinion. I must follow the law under my oath as a Judge. I am a Catholic which makes it very, very difficult -- but my oath of office calls for me to follow the law as stated and set out by the Appellate Courts of this State.

Thank You.

MR. MINTZ: Thank you, very much, your Honor.

We are very happy that we find ourselves in the courtroom of a Judge who has the courage that your Honor has displayed today. We are very appreciative.

THE COURT: Thank you, Herman.

Item No. 31-A

IN THE COURT OF APPEAL OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

FIRST APPELLATE DISTRICT

DIVISION ONE

Court of Appeal - First App. Dist.
CLIFFORD C. PORTER, Clerk

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Plaintiff and Appellant,

v.

ROBERT W. BARKSDALE,
Defendant and Respondent.

(Muni.Ct.No. 332370-C)

Defendant Robert W. Barksdale was charged by a complaint in the Municipal Court of the San Leandro-Hayward Judicial District, with a violation of Penal Code section 274, as amended in 1967, which states:

"Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, except as provided in the Therapeutic Abortion Act, Chapter 11 (commencing with Section 25950) of Division 20 of the Health & Safety Code, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than two nor more than five years."

The Therapeutic Abortion Act, q.v., was enacted in 1967. It provides that a licensed physician and surgeon is authorized to perform an abortion in "a hospital which is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals" (Health & Saf. Code, § 25951, subd. (a)), if such abortion is approved in advance by a committee of the hospital's medical staff under certain prescribed conditions (§ 25951, subd. (b)), and the committee finds that one or more of the following conditions exist: "(1) There is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother; (2) the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest" (§ 25951, subd. (c)). On the grounds of statutory rape (Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1) an abortion may be approved only if the girl is under the age of 15 years (§ 25952, subd. (c)). "The committee . . . must, in all instances, consist of not less than two licensed physicians and surgeons, and if the proposed termination of pregnancy will occur after the 13th week of pregnancy, the committee must consist of at least three such licensed physicians and surgeons. . . ." (§ 25953.) The act further provides that an abortion shall not be approved after the 20th week of pregnancy. (§ 25953.)

Prior to any preliminary examination, defendant generally demurred to the complaint, urging that Penal Code section 274, being violative of the Constitution of the United States, failed to state a public offense. The municipal court, stating -- "The court can find no compelling interest of the state, and concludes that the right to choose to bear or not to bear children is a fundamental right of the individual woman to be exercised in any manner she chooses and which may not in any way be abridged by the law" -- sustained the demurrer and thereafter dismissed the complaint.

The People appealed the judgment of dismissal to the Alameda County Superior Court. (See Pen. Code, § 1466.) That court reversed, but certified "that the transfer of [the] case to the Court of Appeal appears necessary to secure uniformity of decision or to settle important questions of law." (See Cal. Rules of Court, rules 63 and 64.) We thereupon ordered the cause transferred to this court for hearing and decision.

The parties have chosen to concede in their briefs and oral argument, and at least for the purposes of this appeal, (1) that the charged abortion was performed during the first trimester (13 weeks) of the woman's pregnancy, (2) by a "licensed physician and surgeon," (3) but not in "a hospital which is accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals," or in any hospital.

Defendant's primary contention is stated in this manner: "California Penal Code section 274, beyond requiring that abortions must be performed by medical doctors under medically competent procedures, may not prohibit a woman from aborting her first trimester embryo or fetus." More specifically it is urged that the right of a woman to abort an early pregnancy is essentially one of the "penumbral" rights created by the First,

Third, Fourth, Fifth and Ninth Amendments, "the right of privacy as described and given effect in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 484-485.

Principal reliance is placed by defendant upon certain dicta of People v. Belous (1969) 71 Cal.2d 954, which considered the constitutionality of Penal Code section 274, as in effect prior to its 1967 amendment. The earlier statute provided: "Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, unless the same is necessary to preserve her life, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than two nor more than five years." (Emphasis added.)

In Belous the California Supreme Court, divided 4 to 3, concluded that the pre-1967 section 274 was constitutionally invalid, for the reason that its language permitting an abortion only when "necessary to preserve [the woman's] life," was unconstitutionally "vague and uncertain." The court went no further in its actual holding.

We shall first discuss the effect to be given dicta of California's Supreme Court by the lesser courts of the state.

Dicta, of course, consists of things said in an opinion that are not necessary in reaching the decision of the court. (See Childers v. Childers, 74 Cal.App.2d 56, 61-62.) It is held that such "statements of conclusions not necessary to the decision are not to be regarded as authority. . . ." (Cox v. Tyrone Power Enterprises, 49 Cal.App.2d 383, 397; see also People v. McAllister, 15 Cal.2d 519, 523; Hills v. Superior Court, 207 Cal. 666, 670.)

Nevertheless, it has been pointed out that the real criticism of dicta "goes to those portions of an opinion which assume to determine matters outside the issues and hence [are] not fully discussed and considered. . . ." (Estate of Wever, 12 Cal.App.2d 237, 239.) Where a point, although dictum, is "quite elaborately considered" (Adams v. Seaman, 82 Cal. 636, 639), or given "full consideration" (Lossman v. City of Stockton, 6 Cal.App.2d 324, 330), it will be given respectful consideration by another reviewing court. (See also San Joaquin etc. Irr..Co. v. Stanislaus, 155 Cal. 21, 28; Granger v. Sherriff, 133 Cal. 416, 417; Paley v. Superior Court, 137 Cal.App.2d 450, 460; Donnell v. Linforth, 11 Cal.App.2d 25, 29.) When the dicta is that of our state's Supreme Court this rule must be particularly applicable to its Court of Appeal.

The respect which must be shown such considered comment of the California Supreme Court was elaborated by the United States Supreme Court in Nolan v. Transocean Air Lines, 365 U.S. 293, 295. There the court found "considered [relevant] dictum" in the case of Leeper v. Beltrami, 53 Cal.2d 195. It was said: "Inasmuch as the view expressed therein by the highest court of California may be decisive of an issue critical to petitioners' claims, and inasmuch as the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is charged with mandatory appellate review in the present case, that court should decide what relative weights, as authoritative sources for ascertaining California law, the New York Court of Appeals would accord to the Sears-Haro line (direct holdings of District Courts of Appeal between 1930 and 1938) and to Leeper (a considered, relevant dictum of general scope by the California Supreme Court in 1959). We set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeals and remand to that court for reconsideration of the case in light of the new factor introduced by Leeper v. Beltrami, supra."

The California Supreme Court in People v. Belous, supra, 71 Cal.2d 954, was of course speaking in the context of a law generally denying a woman's right to an abortion. It was said (p. 963): "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex."[1] And speaking of the right of a woman to choose whether to bear children, the court stated (p. 964), "It is not surprising that none of the parties who have filed briefs in this case have disputed the existence of this fundamental right."

The court continued (p. 964): "The critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the state . . ., whether the regulation is 'necessary . . . to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy' . . ., and whether legislation impinging on constitutionally protected areas is narrowly drawn and not of 'unlimited and indiscriminate sweep' . . . ."[2]

The Belous court then proceeded to discuss the several suggested "compelling" state interests in the suppression of abortions.

First considered was the unquestioned state interest in the health and well-being of the pregnant woman. It was pointed out (in the course of a scholarly study, see generally pp. 964-965) that "When California's first anti-abortion statute was enacted, any surgical procedure which entered a body cavity was extremely dangerous. Surgeons did not know how to control infection, and mortality was high. Woody, 61 Cal.2d 716, 718 [40 Cal.Rptr. 69, 394 P.2d 813]), and whether legislation impinging on constitutionally protected areas is narrowly drawn and not of 'unlimited and indiscriminate sweep' (Shelton v. Tucker (1960) 364 U.S. 479, 490 [5 L.Ed.2d 231, 238, 81 S.Ct. 247]; see also, Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940) 310 U.S. 296, 308 [84 L.Ed. 1213, 1220, 60 S.Ct. 900, 128 A.L.R. 1352]; In re Berry, 68 Cal. 2d 137, 151 [65 Cal.Rptr. 273, 436 P.2d 273]; In re Hoffman, 67 Cal. 2d 845, 853-854 [64 Cal.Rptr. 97, 434 P.2d 353]).

Although development was slow, techniques of antisepsis and asepsis became major general advances in surgery at and after the turn of the century. In due course safe procedures were developed for specific operations. Curettage, used for abortion in the first trimester, became a safe, accepted and routinely employed medical technique, especially after antibiotics were developed in the early 1940's. [Citation.] It is now safer for a woman to have a hospital therapeutic abortion during the first trimester than to bear a child."

Suggesting that the health of the pregnant woman may have been a compelling state interest bolstering the state's early anti-abortion law, the court added (p. 967): "Although we may assume that the law was valid when first enacted, the validity of the law in 1850 does not resolve the issue of whether the law is constitutionally valid today. [Citations.]"

We note the emphasis of Belous that its study indicated that the relative safety of present day medical techniques exists when the therapeutic abortion occurs during the earlier period of the pregnancy. The court strongly implied that a compelling state interest in the health of the woman, justifying a statutory proscription of abortions, does exist at some later stage of the pregnancy.

The court then discussed the dangers of so-called "criminal abortions," i.e., those prohibited by section 274 and usually performed by unlicensed persons. It was said (pp. 965-966):

"Although abortions early in pregnancy, and properly performed present minimal danger to the woman, criminal abortions are 'the most common single cause of maternal deaths in California.' [Citation.] In California, it is estimated that 35,000 to 100,000 such abortions occur each year. [Citation.]

"The incidence of severe infection from criminal abortion is very much greater than the incidence of death. The Los Angeles County Hospital alone, for example, in 1961 admitted over 3,500 patients treated for such abortions. [Citation.] Possibly more significant than the mere incidence of infection caused by criminal abortions is the result of such infection. 'Induced Illegal Abortion . . . is one of the important causes of subsequent infertility and pelvic disease.' [Citations.]

"Amici for appellant, 178 deans of medical schools, including the deans of all California medical schools, chairmen of medical school departments, and professors of medical schools state: 'These recorded facts bring one face-to-face with the hard, shocking -- almost brutal -- reality that our statute designed in 1850 to protect women from serious risks to life and health has in modern times become a scourge.'"

The Belous court also considered the argument that the state has "a compelling interest in the protection of the embryo and fetus." (P. 967.) It appeared to recognize that at some stage of pregnancy the state did acquire such an interest, even to the exclusion of the conflicting right of the woman. (See pp. 967-969.) But the court made it clear that a woman's right to choose whether to bear children must prevail over such a state right in the pregnancy's early stage.

It was not contended by the People in Belous, and it is not contended here, that any legitimate state interest requires a larger or expanding population, at least as against the right of a woman to choose whether to bear children. Such a contention, if made, would seem to run contrary to reason in the light of scientific knowledge and the world's present day and projected population problems.

It must be said that the text of Belous which we have discussed discloses thorough and thoughtful consideration of the rights of a pregnant woman, vis-a-vis the state, in the matter of abortion legislation. Under the authority we have cited, ante, and as an intermediate appellate court of this state, we feel obliged to respect the dicta of Belous and to accept it as a correct expression of the law.

Several federal district courts have paid similar respect to the discussion of Belous.

Doe v. Scott (1971) 321 F.Supp. 1385, 1388 (N.D. Illinois, E.D.), concerned an attack on the constitutionality of an Illinois statute which prohibited all abortions except those "'performed by a physician . . . in a licensed hospital . . . because necessary for the preservation of the woman's life.'" The issue presented was (p. 1390) "whether the state has a compelling interest in preventing abortions in the early stages of pregnancy . . . ." The majority of a three-judge court, relying heavily on Belous, ruled (p. 1391): ". . . that during the early stages of pregnancy--at least during the first trimester--the state may not prohibit, restrict or otherwise limit women's access to abortion procedures performed by licensed physicians operating in licensed facilities." The pertinent statute was held unconstitutional insofar as it restricted or prohibited the "performance of abortions during the first trimester of pregnancy by licensed physicians in a licensed hospital or other licensed medical facility."

In Roe v. Wade (1970) 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D. Tex.) a Texas anti-abortion law was under constitutional attack. The statute made felonious any abortion not required "for the purpose of saving life of the mother." Belous was interpreted (p. 1222) as according "Freedom to choose in the matter of abortions . . . the status of a 'fundamental' right." The Texas statute was found to infringe upon this fundamental right, the three-judge court stating:

"While the Ninth Amendment right to choose to have an abortion is not unqualified or unfettered, a statute designed to regulate the circumstances of abortions must restrict its scope to compelling state interests. There is unconstitutional overbreadth in the Texas Abortion Laws because the Texas Legislature did not limit the scope of the statutes to such interests. On the contrary, the Texas statutes, in their monolithic interdiction, sweep far beyond any areas of compelling state interest." (P. 1223.)

BLEED

The court recognized a probable legitimate state concern over "abortion of the 'quickened' fetus." (P. 1223.) However, it said: "The difficulty with the Texas Abortion Laws [under consideration] is that, even if they promote these interests, they far outstrip these justifications in their impact by prohibiting all abortions except those performed 'for the purpose of saving the life of the mother.'"

Belous (71 Cal.2d 954) was again relied upon by a three-judge court in Babbitz v. McCann (1970) 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D. Wisconsin) wherein a Wisconsin abortion statute was declared violative of the United States Constitution. That statute proscribed abortions unless necessary to save the life of the mother, in which case it must be performed by a physician and, unless "an emergency prevents," in a licensed maternity hospital. The court (pp. 301, 302) quoted the following language of Belous: "'The critical issue is not whether such rights exist, but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of a subject which is within the police powers of the state. . . .'" and then continued:

"Similarly, in the case at bar, we must decide whether the state of Wisconsin has a sufficiently compelling interest to justify the broad restriction on a woman's inherently personal right that is contained in § 940.04(1) and (5), Wis. Stats.

"The defendants urge that the state's interest in protecting the embryo is a sufficient basis to sustain the statute. Upon a balancing of the relevant interests, we hold that a woman's right to refuse to carry an embryo during the early months of pregnancy may not be invaded by the state without a more compelling public necessity than is reflected in the statute in question. When measured against the claimed 'rights' of an embryo of four months or less, we hold that the mother's right transcends that of such an embryo."

POOR COPY

"[P. 302.] Under its police power, the state can regulate certain aspects of abortion. Thus, it is permissible for the state to require that abortions be conducted by qualified physicians. The police power of the state does not, however, entitle it to deny to a woman the basic right reserved to her under the ninth amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which has not yet quickened. The challenged sections of the present Wisconsin statute suffer from an infirmity of fatal overbreadth."

It is to be noted that Doe v. Scott, supra, Roe v. Wade, supra, and Babbitz v. McCann, supra, as well as Belous, place heavy emphasis on the woman's right to an abortion during the early period of the pregnancy. Expressly or impliedly they assert that at some point during pregnancy the woman's right must yield to the state interest in the preservation of the fetus. Roe v. Wade (314 F.Supp. 1217) suggests that this state interest becomes paramount with the "quickened fetus." And as noted, answering the argument that the state has such an interest in the protection of the embryo as to sustain an abortion statute, the court in Babbitz v. McCann stated that the woman's right transcended that of an embryo of four months or less.

This special consideration of the law for the advanced fetus is well documented historically. Courts and Legislatures, in varying contexts, have traditionally demonstrated greater concern for the "quickened" unborn child.[3] A sampling of such authority follows. In ancient English law the killing of the fetus of a "woman quick with childe" was manslaughter; later common law provided as one of the elements of abortion murder that "the foetus [be] quickened." Without such quickening the crimes did not appear to lie. (See Keeler v. Superior Court, supra, 2 Cal.3d 619, 626.) An 1829 statute of New York provided that: "'The wilful killing of an unborn quick child, by any injury to the mother of such child, which would be murder if it resulted in the death of such mother, shall be deemed manslaughter in the first degree.'" (Idem. p. 628.) An early Wisconsin statute (Wis. R.S. 1849, ch. 133) made abortion a punishable offense only if performed upon an unborn "quick" child. A present day statute of the same state (Wis., Stats. § 940.04) provides a much greater penalty for aborting an "unborn quick child," than for an abortion on an "unborn child."

[3] Webster's New International Dictionary (2d ed.) Unabridged, defines "quickening" as "The first motion of the fetus in the uterus felt by the mother, occurring usually about the middle of the term of pregnancy." In Keeler v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.3d 619, 624, fn. 1, the court concluded: "The average full-term pregnancy is 40 weeks."

And as we have seen, the court in Roe v. Wade, supra, 314 F.Supp. 1217, expressed the state concern over abortion of the "quickened" fetus.

From a consideration of Belous and the other authority we have referred to, we are impelled to conclude that a woman has a constitutional right to terminate her pregnancy, subject only to reasonably imposed state restrictions designed to safeguard the health of the woman, and to protect the advanced fetus.

We now direct our inquiry into the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed by the Therapeutic Abortion Act on the woman's right to an abortion.

The first question is whether the provisions requiring an abortion to be performed by a licensed physician and surgeon in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals are reasonably calculated to safeguard the woman's health and well-being.

It is obvious that without the surgical training and expertise of a licensed physician and surgeon an abortion would endanger the health and even life of the woman; no contention to the contrary is made. But the defendant strenuously insists that the place of an abortion operation, as with any other surgical procedure, should be determined by the doctor, in consultation with his patient, uncontrolled by law and in accordance with sound and established medical procedure. He contends that the legislative requirement of a hospital unnecessarily and unreasonably abridges the constitutional right for which he here argues.

We advert again to the scholarly dissertation of Belous. There the court concluded that it was "now safer for a woman to have a hospital therapeutic abortion during the first trimester than to bear a child." (Emphasis added.) (71 Cal. 2d at p. 965.) Its studies had indicated that "in California from November 1967 through September 1968, 3,775 therapeutic [hospital] abortions were reported without a maternal death. . . ." (P. 965, fn. 7.) On the other hand, during one year alone over 3,500 women with severe infection resulting from illegal non-hospital abortions were found to have been treated in one Los Angeles hospital. (P. 966.) And such illegal non-hospital abortions were disclosed to be "'the most common single cause of maternal deaths in California.'" (P. 965.)

For obvious reasons women seeking abortions often wish to keep knowledge of this fact from others, particularly their families and friends. Given the choice of hospital or more private surroundings they would more often choose the latter, for a hospital stay with its relative lack of privacy and its attendant records is far more likely to become commonly known. Such consideration would tend to place undue pressure on the doctor to arrange an inadequate medical environment, even when his medical judgment indicates the need of a hospital situs for the operation.

We note that in Doe v. Scott, supra, 321 F.Supp. 1385, 1391, the court found a statutory requirement that a constitutionally permitted abortion be "performed by licensed physicians operating in licensed facilities" (emphasis added) not to be unreasonably restrictive. And the court in Roe v. Wade, supra, 314 F.Supp. 1217, 1223, found a legitimate state interest "in seeing to it that abortions are performed by competent persons and in adequate surroundings." (Emphasis added.)

We conclude that the licensed "physician and surgeon" and the "hospital" requirements of the Therapeutic Abortion Act are reasonably designed by the Legislature to further the health and welfare of the pregnant woman seeking an abortion.

Pointing to the act's requirement of a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, defendant insists that in any event this constitutes "overbread and constitutional vulnerability.

We first observe that in California all hospitals must be licensed by the State Department of Public Health. (Health & Saf. Code, § 1400.) The department is required to make and promulgate reasonable rules and regulations "prescribing minimu standards of safety and sanitation [and] of diagnostic, therapeutic and laboratory facilities and equipment . . . ." (Healt & Saf. Code, § 1411.) Hospitals must be periodically inspected by the department (Health & Saf. Code, § 1407), in which author is vested to suspend or revoke a hospital license for, among other things, violation of the prescribed rules and regulations (Health & Saf. Code, § 1412).

We note further that the Joint Commission on Accredita tion of Hospitals is a private body composed of members and organizations of the medical profession. Its purpose is to maintain and supervise professional standards in accordance with its "Standards for Hospital Accreditation." While most of California's hospitals appear to be "accredited," it nevertheless appears that many, even county hospitals, lack such accreditation and are therefore unavailable for the otherwise legitimate purpose of the Therapeutic Abortion Act.

As we have concluded, a woman has a constitutional right to terminate a pregnancy subject to reasonably enacted legislative restrictions supporting legitimate state interests. By its "accredited hospital" provision the Legislature has delegated to a private organization power to determine the hospital standards under which abortions may be performed. It is established law that a Legislature may not delegate its legislative power to a private person or organization. (Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238; Schechter Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495; Daigh v. Shaffer, 23 Cal.App.2d 449. See also 16 Am.Jur.2d, Constitutional Law, § 249, p. 499; 16 C.J.S., Constitutional Law, § 137, pp. 566-567; and see the authorities in those works cited.) This rule must apply with even greater force to a legislative delegation of power affecting a constitutionally guaranteed right.

It appears that an abortion is now a relatively simple and safe surgical procedure. (See discussion, People v. Belous, supra, 71 Cal.2d 954, 965-967.) Yet, although any other surgical procedure, no matter how intricate or demanding or dangerous, may be performed in a "licensed" hospital, abortions alone must under the act be performed under the higher or different standards of an "accredited hospital."

Further, it is obvious that the "accredited hospital" provision decreases the number of hospitals available for abortion procedures. And the requirement must, in many cases, unnecessarily increase the distance to the hospital and otherwise inconvenience the physician and surgeon and his patient seeking an abortion.

We conclude that the accredited hospital provision imposes an unnecessary and unreasonable restraint upon the constitutionally guaranteed right under discussion.

We also find the act's requirement of approval of an abortion in advance by a committee of the hospital's medical staff to be without reasonable constitutional justification. The obvious principal purpose of this requirement is to assure that a statutory condition permitting an abortion, i.e., danger to the woman's health, or rape, or incest, exists. As we have shown, no compelling state interest can be found in this area. To the extent that the committee might provide additional assurance that the woman's health would not be adversely affected by the operation we also find no compelling state interest. It will reasonably be presumed that the woman's health would be considered and safeguarded by her physician and surgeon.

The act's provision that no abortion be allowed after the twentieth week of pregnancy undoubtedly rests upon legisl consideration for the protection of the quickened fetus, as well as the greater danger to the woman attending the abortion of an advanced pregnancy. This restriction, we believe, is reasonably supported by the compelling state interests we have discussed.

No merit is found in defendant's contention that he and his patient were denied equal protection of the law. (Cf., Babbitz v. McCann, supra, 310 F.Supp. 293, 298.) And we find nothing resembling a bill of attainder in the subject statutes. Other points raised by defendant, because of the conclusions we have reached, have become moot to a determination of his appeal.

It is established law that "'When part of a statute is declared unconstitutional, the remainder will stand if it is complete in itself and would have been adopted by the legislative body had the latter foreseen the partial invalidity of the statute.'" (In re Perez, 65 Cal.2d 224, 231.) "The test of severability is whether the invalid parts of the statute can be severed from the otherwise valid parts without destroying the statutory scheme, or the utility of the remaining provisions. . . ." (Blumenthal v. Board of Medical Examiners, 57 Cal.2d 228, 238.) Applying these rules we conclude that the unconstitutional features of Penal Code section 274 and the Therapeutic Abortion Act which we have pointed out are severable from the remainder of the statutes.

We hold that Penal Code section 274 and the Therapeutic Abortion Act are unconstitutional insofar as they purport to deny, or impose restrictions upon, a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy within its first 20 weeks by an abortion which is performed by a licensed physician and surgeon in a licensed hospital of this state.

From all of the foregoing it appears that the municipal court complaint which, among other things, by legal implication charges that the subject abortion was not performed in a hospital, does allege the commission of a public offense by defendant. The sustaining of his demurrer by the municipal court was error.

The judgment of dismissal by the municipal court is reversed.

BLEED

I concur and dissent. I concur in the determination that the complaint states a public offense and that, therefore, the judgment of dismissal by the municipal court must be reversed. I do not, however, concur in the majority holding that a woman has the constitutional right to terminate pregnancy by abortion subject only to the conditions that such abortion must take place within the first 20 weeks of pregnancy and that it be performed by a licensed physician and surgeon in a licensed hospital in this state; nor do I concur in the determination that Penal Code section 274 and the Therapeutic Abortion Act (Health & Saf. Code, §§ 25950-25954) are unconstitutional in the respects indicated by the majority.

The effect of the majority opinion is to remove from the Therapeutic Abortion Act, as constitutionally invalid, the requirements that an abortion may be performed only when the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother or the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest, and the requirement that an abortion must take place in an accredited hospital with the prior approval of the hospital's therapeutic abortion committee.

It should be noted, initially, that a statute is presumed to be constitutional unless its unconstitutionality clearly and unmistakably appears that all intendments are in favor of its validity, and that mere doubt is not a sufficient reason for a judicial declaration of its invalidity. (Fox etc. Corp. v. City of Bakersfield, 36 Cal.2d 136, 141; Lockheed Aircraft Corp. v.

Superior Court, 28 Cal.2d 481, 484; Jones-Hamilton Co. v. Franchise Tax Bd., 268 Cal.App.2d 343, 349; People v. Aguiar, 257 Cal.App.2d 597, 601.) As observed in United States v. Vuitch, ____ U.S. _____, _____ [28 L.Ed.2d 601, 608], "statutes should be construed whenever possible so as to uphold their constitutionality."

In People v. Belous, 71 Cal.2d 954, on whose dicta the majority opinion relies, the Supreme Court observed that it did not have to reach the issue of the constitutional validity of the Therapeutic Abortion Act because the abortion in that case had been performed prior to the adoption of the act. (At p. 973, fn. 15.) A close reading of the case indicates, however, that the reviewing court deemed that the state has a compelling interest in regulating abortions. Implicit throughout the decision is the concept that abortions may be limited by the state if the statute is sufficiently clear and narrowly drawn. I perceive that although the court had ample opportunity in Belous to strike down abortion laws in general it did not do so. Instead it simply found that Penal Code section 274, as it read when the conduct there under consideration occurred, contained vague and uncertain provisions which jeopardized its operation by placing an unfair and dangerous responsibility upon any medical practitioner who attempted to follow it.[1] (At pp. 972-973.)

1 - Section 274 of the Penal Code then read as follows: "Every person who provides, supplies, or administers to any woman, or procures any woman to take any medicine, drug, or substance, or uses or employs any instrument or other means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of such woman, unless the same is necessary to preserve her life, is punishable by imprisonment in the State prison not less than two nor more than five years.

BLEED T

In reaching its conclusion with respect to the validity of the Therapeutic Abortion Act the majority seizes upon the statement in Belous that "The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgment of a 'right of privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family, and sex. [Citations.]" (71 Cal.2d at p. 963.) My colleagues interpret this statement to mean that a woman has a fundamental right to have an abortion subject only to the condition that it be performed in a licensed hospital by a licensed doctor.

None of the cases cited as authority by Belous for the principle embraced in the subject statement, including Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, stands for the proposition that a woman has an unqualified right to have an abortion or that she has such a right subject to appropriate medical procedures. At most these cases hold that a woman can choose whether or not she wishes to conceive a child. Adverting to Griswold, I perceive that its holding was limited to a declaration that a statute forbidding the use of contraceptives violates the right of marital privacy guaranteed by several fundamental constitutional guarantees specified in the Bill of Rights. (Pp. 484-485.)[2]

[2] - Two of the cases cited in Belous deal particularly with the right to have offspring as a right which is basic to the perpetuation of a race. In Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, the United States Supreme Court struck down a statute of Oklahoma which provided for the sterilization of persons defined to be "habitual criminals." The court there made this statement: "We are dealing here with legislation which involves one of the basic civil

Contrary to the implications of the majority opinion, Belous lays great stress upon the prospective mother's health and the criteria of good medical practice as valid standards for determining whether an abortion is lawful. (At pp. 965-971.) Recognition is specifically given to the test established in the Therapeutic Abortion Act., i.e. that abortion is permissible during the first 20 weeks of pregnancy if performed by a licensed physician in an accredited hospital and if it is determined "under prescribed procedures" that there is a substantial risk that the continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother or that the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest. (71 Cal.2d at p. 971; emphasis added.)

In Belous there is specific recognition of the necessity that an abortion be performed in a hospital providing an accepted surgical environment. The dangers posed by a non-hospital abortion were noted thusly: "Although abortions early in pregnancy, and properly performed present minimal danger to the woman, criminal abortions [i.e., those obtained other than from a physician in an accepted surgical environment] are 'the most common single cause of maternal deaths in California.' [Citation.]" (At p.

2 - (Cont'd) rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race." (At p. 541.) In Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, the United States Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a Virginia statute which prevented marriages between persons solely on the basis of racial classifications. In that case we find this statement: "Marriage is one of the 'basic civil rights of man,' fundamental to our very existence and survival." (At p. 12.) It is clear that these two cases were concerned with procreation rather than the termination of pregnanc 965 and fn. 8 at p. 965.)

In Ballard v. Anderson, 4 Cal.3d 873, the Supreme Court, although not specifically called upon to pass on the constitutional validity of the Therapeutic Abortion Act, did, by its analysis and application of the provisions of the act to the facts at hand, give its stamp of approval to the act. Thus, in Ballard, we find the following significant language: "A legal therapeutic abortion under the act may be given only if qualified medical opinion finds (1) a substantial risk that continuancy of the pregnancy will impair the mental or physical health of the prospective mother, or (2) that the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest." (At p. 879; emphasis added.)

In Ballard the question presented was whether the Therapeutic Abortion Committee of a hospital was required to consider the application of a minor for a therapeutic abortion without the consent of her parents. The reviewing court held that such consent was not necessary and that mandamus lies to compel such a committee to exercise its discretion to approve or disapprove a minor's application for abortion "according to the statutory criteria set forth in Health and Safety Code sections 25951-25954." (4 Cal.3d at p. 884.) It is reasonable to assume that the Supreme Court would not have issued the peremptory writ if it had any misgivings that the requirement of prior approval of an abortion by a committee of a hospital's medical staff was an unconstitutional provision or that the court's direction was nothing more than an idle act.

HROUGH POOR COPY CPOY BOUND CLOSE IN CENTER

I apprehend that Belous and Ballard clearly recognize a compelling state interest in protecting the health of a pregnant mother and that the Therapeutic Abortion Act is a salutary method of insuring such protection pursuant to the state's traditional police power to restrict medical procedures to competent medical practitioners operating in sanitary facilities under safe conditions.

It should be noted here that in United States v. Vuitch, supra, ____ U.S. _____, _____ [28 L.Ed.2d 601, 610], a case decided subsequent to Belous, the United States Supreme Court held that a District of Columbia statute,[3] containing language similar to that struck down in Belous, was not constitutionally vague. Significant to the consideration of the instant discussion is the following statement in Vuitch: "The statute does not outlaw all abortions, but only those which are not performed under the direction of a competent, licensed physician, and those not necessary to preserve the mother's life or health." (At p. 608.)

In my opinion the state also has a compelling interest to protect the embryo or fetus as the center of legal rights. There is abundant and respected authority for the proposition that at some time during the period of gestation the embryo or fetus

3 - This statute provided: "Whoever, by means of any instrument, medicine, drug or other means whatever, procures or produces or attempts to procure or produce an abortion or miscarriage on any woman, unless the same were done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health and under the direction of a competent licensed practitioner of medicine, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than one year or not more than ten years; . . ."

becomes a human being entitled to the right of life. Among these are those who hold that human life begins at conception upon the thesis that the genes of the ovum and sperm have every characteristic a human being will ever have as soon as they are united. Others are of the opinion that human life begins at a time during the period of gestation when the fetus takes on a truly human appearance.

There is also abundant and respected contrary authority to the effect that the embryo or fetus is not a human being during the period of gestation, and that human life does not begin until the fetus has developed into a being that is able to live outside the uterus. Until then, say those who hold this opinion, the fetus enjoys no rights and such rights as are generally attributed to it reflect only the interest of the parents. (See People v. Belous, supra, 71 Cal.2d 954, 967-968.)

These propositions appear to be of such generalized and universal knowledge that their existence is beyond dispute so as to require that judicial notice be taken of them. (Evid. Code, § 451, subd. (f).) At the very least they are propositions whose proposals are not reasonably subject to dispute and are capable of immediate and accurate determination by resort to sources of reasonably indisputable accuracy. As such they are matters which may be judicially noticed. (Evid. Code, § 452, subd. (h).)

In the instant case the trial court in passing upon the sufficiency of the complaint took judicial notice of these conflicting viewpoints since the matters embraced therein came to the attention of the court in its consideration of the points and authorities submitted by the parties upon the hearing of the demurrer. (See Evid. Code, §§ 453, 454, 455.) This the trial court was justified in doing since matters which must or may be judicially noticed are a part of the complaint to be read into it together with the matters contained within its four corners. (South Shore Land Co. v. Petersen, 226 Cal.App.2d 725, 742-747; Colvig v. RKO General, Inc., 232 Cal.App.2d 56, 63-64.) As indicated by the trial court in its "Decision on Demurrer" these viewpoints were considered by it. In its decision the trial court adopted as part of its rationale the proposition that life is not present in the embryo at conception and apparently adopted, as a legal proposition, the concept that the fetus is not a human being until it is capable of life out of the mother's womb.

Among the matters called to the attention of the trial court in connection with the aforementioned viewpoints as to when human life begins was evidence adduced at legislative hearings in 1962 to the effect that human life begins at the time of conception. It is inconceivable that the Legislature which enacted the Therapeutic Abortion Act in 1967 did not have before it this proposition as well as the varying and conflicting viewpoints mentioned above.

As a reviewing court, this court is justified in taking judicial notice of each matter properly noticed by the trial court. (See Evid. Code, § 459; Smith v. Hatch, 271 Cal.App.2d 39, 49.) This court is also entitled to consider the facts as they appear on the face of the Therapeutic Abortion Act, since the construction of a statute and its applicability to a given situation are matters of law, and we are not bound by the trial court's construction. (Estate of Madison, 26 Cal.2d 453, 456; Neal v. State of California, 55 Cal.2d 11, 17; Plum v. City of Healdsburg, 237 Cal.App.2d 308, 313.)

Accordingly, it appears to me that in enacting the subject act the state clearly evinced a genuine interest and concern for the unborn. That such was the legislative intent is demonstrated by the provisions of the act which limit abortions to cases where the continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical and mental health of the mother and to those cases where the pregnancy results from rape or incest. If the Legislature had no interest in the embryo or fetus it could simply have provided that a woman was entitled to have an abortion subject only to certain approved medical procedures. The act, however, clearly outlaws all abortions except those performed according to the limitations therein delineated--limitations which Belous recognizes to be properly within the police power of the state.

It is logical to deduce from the facts as appear on the face of the enactment that it was the legislative intent to give the rights of the pregnant woman whose physical or mental health was gravely endangered or whose pregnancy resulted from rape or incest precedence over the rights of the unborn only during the first 20 weeks of pregnancy. It is also logical to deduce from the enactment that it was the legislative intent to outlaw abortions after the 20th week of pregnancy because of the concomitant compelling interest the state has in the health and welfare of the prospective mother and the fetus she is carrying. Belous points out that a hospital therapeutic abortion is a relatively safe procedure in the first trimester of pregnancy (at p. 965), but takes cognizance that "By limiting [in the Therapeutic Abortion Act] the abortion to the first 20 weeks, the Legislature has taken into account the danger to the mother of the later abortion . . . ." (At p. 971.)

In sum, the Therapeutic Abortion Act discloses by its provisions a concern for a pregnant woman's health and the risks of death due to an abortion, a concern that a woman who is the victim of an unwanted pregnancy should not be compelled to give birth to a child so conceived, and a concern for an unborn child's right to life. All of these considerations entered into the legislative process and the resulting legislation was clearly an attempt to reconcile the rights of the prospective mother and those of the embryo or fetus as a human being entitled to life. In the specific instances in which abortions are permitted under the act the Legislature, under its prerogative to determine the wisdom or necessity of the law, has declared that the mother's rights transcend those of the embryo or fetus.

In reaching this conclusion I am not unmindful of the dictum in Belous that "There is nothing to indicate that in adopting the Therapeutic Abortion Act the Legislature was asserting an interest in the embryo." (71 Cal.2d at p. 971.) A reading of Belous discloses, however, that the decision does not completely reject the concept that the embryo or fetus is a center of legal rights but postulates that a pregnant woman's right to life takes precedence over any interest the state may have in the unborn. (At p. 969.)

For the reasons indicated the Therapeutic Abortion Act must be construed so as to uphold its constitutionality. The termination of pregnancy is not an unqualified right beyond regulation by the state, but subject to reasonable limitations consonant with the state's compelling interest in the health and welfare of the prospective mother and the protection of the embryo or fetus. California has imposed valid limitations in its enactment of the act. Since the act is constitutional in its entirety, it is not the province of this court to weigh the desirability of the social policy underlying it or to question its wisdom. These are purely legislative matters.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO

JOSEPH PAUL SHIVELY, M.D., Petitioner, vs. THE BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, an Administrative Agency, Respondent.	No. 590333 FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW (C.C.P.,Secs. 632; 1109)

The above entitled cause came on regularly for hearing on July 16, 1968. Robert L. Lamb and Charles G. Norris appeared for Petitioner; Thomas Lynch, Attorney General of the State of California, by Gerald Carreras, Deputy Attorney General, appeared for Respondent.

The cause was submitted and heard on the pleadings, documents and records herein; the Record; Transcript of Testimony, Volumes I and II and Exhibits introduced "In the Matter of the Accusation against J. Paul Shively, M.D.," said hearing held on January 22 and 23, 1968. Said testimony and exhibit being duly filed and introduced in evidence. Respondent's Decision and Findings; Points and Authorities; Summaries and Arguments of respective counsel.

The matter was submitted to the Court for decision, and the Court being fully advised in the premises, and having rendered its decision in favor of Petitioner and against Respondent now makes the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. In each instance alleged in Respondent's Accusation, as hereinafter specified, Petitioner J. Paul Shively, M.D. participated in the obtaining or performing of a therapeutic abortion at an accredited hospital with the approval of the hospital's therapeutic abortion committee in a case of proven rubella in the first trimester of the patient's pregnancy.

2. On or about August 6, 1963, Petitioner did not aid and abet a criminal abortion upon the person of Alice F. McIntosh.

3. On or about April 20, 1964, Petitioner did not aid and abet a criminal abortion upon the person of Diana Martin.

4. On or about April 22, 1964, Petitioner did not attempt to perform a criminal abortion upon the person of Diana Martin.

5. On or about May 18, 1965, Petitioner did not agree and offer to procure a criminal abortion upon the person of Eileen Selig.

6. On or about May 18, 1965, Petitioner did not aid and abet a criminal abortion upon the person of Eileen Selig.

7. On or about May 20, 1965, Petitioner did not attempt to perform a criminal abortion upon the person of Eileen Selig.

8. On or about May 20, 1965, Petitioner did not agree and offer to procure a criminal abortion upon the person of Sharon Signer.

9. On or about May 20, 1965, Petitioner did not aid and abet a criminal abortion upon the person of Sharon Signer.

10. On or about May 22, 1965, Petitioner did not perform a criminal abortion upon the person of Sharon Signer.

11. On or about June 9, 1965, Petitioner did not aid and abet a criminal abortion upon the person of Betty Logwood.

12. On or about May 28, 1964, Petitioner did not aid and abet a criminal abortion upon the person of Thelma Lofink.

13. Petitioner, in good faith, and with a sincere opinion that it was an acceptable standard of medical practice in the City and County of San Francisco to perform therapeutic abortions in accredited hospitals in cases of proven rubella during the first trimester where the approval of a therapeutic abortion committee was first obtained rendered said medical attention to each individual named in the Accusation against him.

14. Petitioner's conduct was influenced by the fact that the Medical Schools of the University of California, the University of California at Los Angeles, Stanford University, and the University of Southern California, during the period of 1964 and 1965, taught, in the medical curriculum, that it was an acceptable standard of medical practice to perform therapeutic abortions in an accredited hospital in cases of proven rubella during the first trimester, when the approval of a therapeutic abortion committee was first obtained.

15. Petitioner's conduct was further influenced by the fact that a large segment of the licensed and practicing physicians and surgeons in the counties contiguous to San Francisco Bay held the same opinion as did Dr. Shively.

With respect to Petitioner's involvement as found in Causes and Action First, Second, Fourth, Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, Tenth and Eleventh of the Accusation, Petitioner was voluntarily acting, without compensation, as a member of a Therapeutic Abortion Committee as the result of Petitioner's being a staff member of an accredited hospital, in conformity with what was, in good faith, believed to be acceptable medical practice.

16. In each instance, Petitioner followed procedures and practices and complied with existing standards of acceptable medical care recognized and approved by those reasonably skilled in his profession practicing in the same community.

17. Petitioner rendered professional care, in each instance, in an honest, competent and professional manner in the exercise of his best skill and understanding in good faith, with concern for the health, life and welfare of the patient.

18. In each alleged instance, Petitioner intended and believed that the therapeutic abortion was necessary to preserve the life of the mother.

19. In each alleged instance of Petitioner's participation in the performance of a therapeutic abortion with the approval of the appropriate committee in and of an accredited hospital in cases of proven rubella in the first trimester of pregnancy, the operation was necessary to preserve the life of the mother.

20. The permanent and public record of an unjustified conviction of criminal abortion causes serious and irreparable injury to Petitioner's reputation and future as a Board certified obstetrician and gynecologist.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The statement in Business and Professions Code §2377 that a criminal abortion constitutes unprofessional conduct, refers to that activity and intent defined as the crime of abortion by Penal Code §274, as the statutes exist in 1963, 1964 and 1965 when the conduct in question occurred.

2. The abortion statute, Penal Code §274, does not mean by the words "unless the same is necessary to preserve her life" that the peril to life be imminent. It is enough that the dangerous condition be potentially present, even though its full development might be delayed to a greater or less extent. Nor was it essential that the doctor should believe that the death of the patient would be otherwise certain in order to justify him in affording present relief.

People v. Abarbanel (1965) 239 Cal. App. 2d 31, 34

3. The burden of establishing the criminal nature of the abortions in which Petitioner participated rests with the Respondent Board of Medical Examiners and requires a demonstration through evidence that the procedure was not necessary to preserve the life of the mother; an abortion is not necessarily, in and of itself, a criminal act.

People v. Abarbanel (1965) 239 Cal. App. 2d 31, 34

4. The criminal intent necessary to be established by Respondent Board of Medical Examiners in order to find that Petitioner was guilty is the intent to commit a criminal abortion; that is, an abortion for the purpose other than to preserve the life of the mother.

People v. Abarbanel (1965) 239 Cal. App. 2d 31, 34

5. Petitioner acted in good faith in accordance with the practices and procedures recognized and approved by those reasonably skilled in his profession in the community, then it cannot be said that the operation was not necessary to preserve the life of the patient.

6. Petitioner, exercising his best professional skill and understanding, honestly believes that the operation is necessary for the preservation of the life of the mother, he cannot be found guilty of a criminal abortion.

People v. Abarbanel (1965) 239 Cal. App. 2d 31, 34

7. Respondent's power to discipline medical practitioners is not punitive and requires an established instance of professional disservice, ignorance, dishonesty or incompetence justifying action for public protection.

8. Respondent's disciplinary authority over Petitioner as a licensed physician and surgeon justifies the proceedings and includes the power to inquire as to the facts upon which Respondent's jurisdiction depends.

9. Respondent may resolve and determine issues of fact, but can neither restrict the legal consequences thereof nor render a valid order upon an erroneous conclusion of law for to do so would exercise judicial powers reserved to the courts.

Aylward v. Bd. Chiropractic Exam. (1948) 31 Cal. 2d 833, 839

10. Where an administrative decision is not based upon a determination of fact, but upon an erroneous conclusion of law, and is without the Board's authority, the order is void.

Aylward v. Bd. of Chiropractic Exam. (1948) 31 Cal. 2d 833, 839

11. Respondent's decision finds, on the basis of uncontroverted evidence, that Petitioner acted in the honest opinion that the procedures in which he participated conformed with approved medical practice, were followed by many physicians and surgeons in the community, were taught by the major medical schools in this State and were rendered due to his concern for preserving the life of the patient. Respondent's interest and authority over the subject-matter terminated upon finding facts contradicting and excluding unprofessional conduct.

12. Respondent's determination of facts set forth in the Decision rendered in Petitioner's proceeding is based upon uncontroverted evidence and testimony establishing circumstances precluding Petitioner's guilt of a criminal abortion as a matter of law.

13. On the basis of the Findings of Fact Petitioner was not guilty of performing a criminal abortion in that all of the women allegedly aborted were entitled to protection under the provisions of Amendment VIII of the Constitution of the United States, and Article I, Section 6, of the Constitution of the State of California.

14. On the basis of the Findings of Fact, Petitioner was not guilty of performing a criminal abortion in that all of the women allegedly aborted were entitled to protection under the provisions of Amendment XIV of the Constitution of the United States, and Article I, Section 13, Clause 6, of the Constitution of the State of California.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

1. The defendant has been indicted in a three-count indictment charging that he "committed the offense of solicitation to commit abortion in that he did willfully and unlawfully urge, encourage and advise a female..... to have an unlawful abortion committed, in violation of Chapter 38, Secs. 8-1 and 23-1, Illinois Revised Statutes, 1967." (Each of the three counts names a different female person.)

2. Defendant has filed a 2-pronged attack upon the indictment: (1) He moves to dismiss the indictment because the statute above referred to is unconstitutional because "it is vague, inexplicable of definition and impossible to decipher"; and, (2) because even presuming the constitutionality of the statute, the indictment does not charge the offense of "solicitation to commit abortion."

3. The defendant's position on both grounds is sustained by this Court.

THE FAILURE OF THE INDICTMENT TO ALLEGE A CRIME

4. Sec. 8-1 of Chap. 38, Ill. Rev. Stat. 1967, defines solicitation as follows:

> "A person commits solicitation when, with intent that an offense be committed he commands, encourages or requests another to commit that offense."

5. The indictment charged the defendant with encouraging a female to "have an unlawful abortion committed". It is obviously impossible for the female to commit a legal abortion on herself, as the Abortion Statute, Sec. 23-1, plainly imports the commission of an abortion upon a woman by another. And, it is obvious that the indictment does not charge that the defendant encouraged or requested the female to commit the crime of abortion, merely to have "an unlawful abortion committed".

6. The statute is plain and unambiguous: A person is guilty of solicitation when he encourages or requests another to commit the offense of abortion. Encouraging a female to have an abortion committed, which is what the indictment charges, is nowhere made an offense by any statute. Where an indictment, information or complaint which does not define those acts allegedly committed by the defendant to be specific and definite, the indictment fails.

7. And in the instant case, where the State alleged its specifics it failed to allege any crime in accordance with any existing statute.

8. Accordingly there can be no solicitation to encourage a female "to have an unlawful abortion committed" and the indictment is void on that ground.

9. Sec. 23-1 of the Criminal Code states as follows:

> "(a) A person commits abortion when he uses any instrument, medicine, drug or other substance whatever, with the intent to procure a miscarriage of any woman. It shall not be necessary in order to commit abortion that such woman be pregnant or, if pregnant, that a miscarriage be in fact accomplished. A person convicted of abortion shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary from one to ten years."
> "(b) It shall be an affirmative defense to abortion that the abortion was performed by a physician licensed to practice medicine and surgery in all its branches and in a licensed hospital or other licensed medical facility because necessary for the preservation of the woman's life. 1961, July 28, Laws 1961, p. 1983, Sec. 23-1".

The statute is unconstitutional (1) for vagueness; and (2) for infringing upon a woman's right to control her body.

10. In Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, the Supreme Court held that when a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess as to its meaning and differ as to its application, such statute violates the first essential of due process of law, (p. 453).

11. A similar statute was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of California, People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Reptr. 354 (1969). That court held that a statute making a person who performs an abortion punishable unless abortion is necessary to preserve a mother's life was invalid where the term "necessary to preserve" was not susceptible to a construction which was sufficiently certain to satisfy due process requirements.

12. Just as the defendant in Belous, who did not commit the abortion but who referred the patient to a non-physician who did, had standing to raise the constitutional question, the instant defendant likewise has standing. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 481; Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249, 257.

13. The court does not find any compelling state interest sufficient to override the infringement on the personal liberty of a woman effected by the statute here being challenged.

"The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this court's repeated acknowledgement of a 'right to privacy' or 'liberty' in matters related to marriage, family and sex. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479; Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12; 18 L. Ed. 2d. 1010 (statute prohibiting interracial marriages held violative of the due process clause).

Recently, a three-judge court sitting in the United States District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin (Milwaukee), headed by Judge Kerner of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, held unconstitutional a somewhat similar statute (Sec. 940.04 Wis. Stats.) as the one at bar. Babbitz, Plaintiff v. McCann, et al, Defendants, No. 69-C-548. The three-judge court held "upon a balancing of the relevant interest, we hold that a woman's right to refuse to carry an embryo during the early months of pregnancy may not be invaded by the State without a more compelling public necessity than is reflected in the statute in question. When measured against the claimed 'right' of an embryo of four months or less, we hold that the mother's right transcends that of such an embryo." And recently also, a District Court in the District of Columbia invalidated an abortion law in slightly different language. United States v. Vuitch, 38 L. W. 2275 (Nov. 10, 1969). The court in Vuitch observed: "There has been moreover, an increasing indication in decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that as a secular matter, a woman's liberty and right of privacy extends to family, marriage and sex matters and may well include the right to remove an unwanted child at least in the early stages of pregnancy." Accordingly, the Illinois Abortion Statute is unconstitutional in the opinion of this Court.

CONCLUSION

16. For the foregoing reasons, this court holds the statute to be unconstitutional and further holds the indictment to be insufficient; and it is hereby dismissed.

Respectfully submitted,

O P I N I O N

CAMPBELL, P.J.:

History

On October 21, 1968, the defendant, a motorcycle mechanic who acquired his expertise in the merchant marines, entered a plea of guilty to a charge that he aborted two unmarried pregnant women. He was sentenced to the state penitentiary for a term of two to five years.

The Act of June 24, 1939, P.L. 872, Section 718 (18 P.S. 4718) was the statutory basis for the prosecution. It is a "broad brush" statute prohibiting all abortions without exception within the state of Pennsylvania.

On March 4, 1970, the defendant filed a PCHA petition alleging that the aforesaid abortion statute is unconstitutional in that it violates the constitutions of Pennsylvania and the United States.

The Social Problem

The problem of abortion is a matter of great current concern in the United States. Aside from the moral and religious issues involved, the resulting social implications and effects are great. The Kinsey group have estimated that one out of every five pregnancies in the United States end in abortion. The annual take by non-professional abortionists has been estimated to be over $350,000,000 a year and is thought to be the third largest illegal endeavor in the United States, exceeded only by gambling and narcotics. (1) It has further been estimated that over 5,000 women die each year from criminal abortions. (2) As a result of the enormous resulting problems, abortion statutes are being subjected to critical review.

State's Compelling Interest

The commonwealth is aided by the presumption in favor of the constitutionality of the statute. Aside from this presumption, courts have traditionally upheld the constitutionality of state legislation if it can establish an overriding legitimate legislative purpose to justify the interference with individual and family privacy. Thus the real question, as stated in People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rep. 354; 38 LW 2167 (1969), was not "whether the right exists but whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of the subject which is within the police power of the state."

What is the state's compelling interest in the abortion statute? Is it to discourage fornication and other illicit sexual conduct? If so, why does the statute apply to both married and unmarried women?

Is the state's compelling interest the desire to preserve the health and welfare of women? Why, then, does it apply in bold fiat to medical doctors who possess the requisite skill to easily perform a safe abortion during at least the first trimester of pregnancy? There is abundant medical opinion that it is safer for a woman to have a hospital therapeutic abortion than to bear a child.

Is the state's compelling interest the desire to protect the rights of the fetus? The 14th Amendment to the U.S. Constitution requires that the state accord "due process of law" and "equal protection of the laws" to any person within their respective jurisdiction and that all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. (emphasis added.) We know of no court which has construed the early development of the fetus as being a person within the meaning of the 14th Amendment and on the contrary believe that it is generally only applicable at birth. The protection of the embryo and fetus does not justify an abortion statute: People v. Belous, supra.

(1) D. Lowe, Abortion and the Law, 3-5 (1966)

(2) Bates and Zawadski, Criminal Abortion, 3-4 (1964).

We can readily perceive of a valid compelling interest of the state in the subject of abortion if it were directed, for example, to prevent an unqualified, unlicensed and untrained individual to perform an abortion which medically would jeopardize the health and safety of the woman involved but, in order to accomplish the result in which the state is interested, the statute must be sufficiently narrow in scope to serve the limited purpose involved: McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184; 85 S. Ct. 283 (1964); Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479; 5 L. Ed. 2d 231 (1960).

We flatly hold that the Pennsylvania statute does not meet this standard because of its broad unlimited and indiscriminate application.

Right to Marital and Personal Privacy

We pass now to the question of whether or not the abortion statute violates the woman's fundamental right to personal privacy and, likewise, the fundamental right to marital privacy.

The Supreme Court of the United States has shown a marked concern with regard to legislative interference in the marital relationship, the individual's right to bear children and to be free from unwarranted invasion upon one's right to privacy. The genesis of such a stance may be seen in such cases as Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479; 14 L.Ed. 2d 510 (1965)(upholding the right to distribute and use prefertilization contraceptive devices); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1; 18 L.Ed. 2d 1010 (1967)(holding a statute prohibiting interracial marriage violative of the Due Process Clause); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535; 86 L.Ed. 1655 (1942)(holding a sterilization law illegal and finding the right to procreation a "basic liberty").

In these and other cases the court has recognized a constitutionally protected right to privacy which is made applicable to the states through the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution.

We believe the rationale of the case of Griswold v. Conn., supra, is applicable and may be extended to abortive action after conception and that the abortion statute interferes with the individual's private right to have or not to have children. Both the Pennsylvania and Connecticut statutes are at odds with current medical practice, both invade the intimate realm of marital privacy, both interfere with a married couple's freedom to control the number and spacing of offspring, and both are in conflict with a solution of one of the world's critical problems, the population explosion.

The United States District Court in U. S. v. Vuitch, 38 LW 2275 (1969)(cert. granted) and the Supreme Court of California in People v. Belous, supra, have each declared an abortion statute unconstitutional. Although these statutes were factually dissimilar to the statute here in question, the rationale we believe to be applicable in many respects.

The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin has declared a state abortion statute unconstitutional as violating a pregnant woman's Ninth Amendment right of privacy: Babbitz v. McCann, 38 LW 2498, decided March 5, 1970. In this case a Wisconsin physician was charged with aborting an unquickened fetus.

We are convinced that the Pennsylvania abortion statute clearly impinges on constitutionally protected areas and without a doubt it is so broad, unlimited and indiscriminate that it fails to meet the present day tests for constitutionality.

Conclusion

We sincerely regret that the question of the constitutionality of this statute should reach this court in its present posture. The reprehensible actions of the defendant are in no way approved or condoned by the language contained herein or the court's decision. The only solace one can gather is the fact that this very statute created the undesirable situation involved in this case and that the legislature may hasten to adopt an abortion statute to meet the needs of present day society. Defendant's petition is therefore granted and the defendant ordered discharged.

STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA, Plaintiff,

-vs-

H. BENJAMIN MUNSON, Defendant.

MEMORANDUM DECISION

Apr. 6, 1970

The defendant herein, a licensed physician, is charged with abortion. By motion his counsel seeks dismissal of the information on the grounds that the abortion statute, under which he is being prosecuted, is unconstitutional.

According to reliable estimates, more than a million American women had abortions last year. Of these about 350,000 needed hospital care when they attempted to abort themselves, and more than 8,000 of these self-help cases died. ("Life" Magazine, Feb. 27, 1970.) Enforcement of the abortion laws has been chiefly against quacks and charlatans who have botched the job, and the woman lived to complain. Where death ensues, the prosecution has been for homicide. It is a rare case where a licensed physician has been prosecuted. In no instances has the woman been prosecuted, although the abortion laws are directed equally against the woman seeking an abortion.

With such mass disregard for the abortion law, reflecting a radical change in public attitude, it is in order to determine whether the exercise of the police power in prohibiting abortion is "sanctioned by usage, held by prevailing morality to be necessary to public welfare, or endangers the vital interests of society", criteria which over the years have been used to measure the right of the state to regulate personal and private conduct.

There has been a concerted drive in recent years to abolish or liberalize the abortion laws by statute or to challenge the constitutionality of such laws. Where the legislatures have acted some have liberalized the abortion laws and some have repealed them outright. Abortion is legal in most of Europe and in England. Most of the abortion laws were passed in the so-called "Victorian" era, a time when moral and religious fervor against anything regarded as sinful, resulted in many laws governing morals and personal conduct. The South Dakota Statute dates back to 1877. Most of these laws governing personal or private conduct, like the "blue laws" have either been repealed or have not been enforced. The laws prohibiting abortion represented a change from the common law which permitted abortion in the initial stages of pregnancy, before quickening of the fetus. In the 19th century when the abortion laws originated, all surgery was risky, and the needs of the frontier era was additional manpower. Now abortion is safer than childbirth, and the highly publicized public interest is in population control.

With the abortion laws on the books, only a small proportion of abortions are performed by licensed physicians, because most doctors are not willing to take the risk of prosecution and loss of their license, however small that may be. The rest are performed by people on a descending scale of competence down to the outright quacks and charlatans, or are performed by the woman herself in desperation where she does not have the funds to finance an illegal abortion. Are the interests of society being served by a law which exposed over a million women last year to such risks? Are the interests of society being served by women bearing unwanted children, subjected to the pressures of an emotionally and financially deprived existence? Are the interests of society being served by the population explosion we are now witnessing?

The abortion law has been held unconstitutional in California on the grounds that the words "necessary to preserve her life" in that state's abortion statute were unconstitutionally vague. People vs. Belous, 458 P(2) 194 (Cal. 1969). The District of Columbia law was invalidated on the same grounds where the language of the statute was "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health". U.S. vs. Vuitch, 38 Law Weekly 2275 (Nov. 10, 1969). The language of the South Dakota statute forbidding abortion, "unless the same is necessary to preserve her life" likewise presents the same basis for invalidity.

However, in the opinion of this court, the invalidity of the abortion law goes much deeper in that it interferes with private conduct without serving any vital interest of society. Indeed, it is a disservice to society under the conditions that have been outlined above. This court agrees without reservation with the recent opinion handed down by a three judge panel of the U. S. District Court for the Eastern District of Wisconsin, in the case of Babbitz vs. McCann, et al., #69-c-548, a copy of which was furnished to the court and opposing counsel by counsel for defendant.

Dr. Babbitz sought an injunction in federal district court against a prosecution in state court for performing an illegal abortion. The Wisconsin statute, set forth in detail in the opinion, provided a different penalty for abortion before quickening of the fetus than was imposed for abortion of the quickened fetus. Dr. Babbitz was charged with aborting a fetus before quickening. The court held that the statute under which he was charged was unconstitutional under the Ninth Amendment to the U. S. Constitution, the court concluding that "the State of Wisconsin may not by statute deprive a woman of her private decision whether to bear her unquickened child", thus squarely facing the fundamental issues involved in the abortion laws.

This court adopts the reasoning of the court in the Babbitz case, under Section IV, which should be read in its entirety, since only portions will be quoted herein for emphasis.

Quoted with approval in Babbitz is the following excerpt from an article by former Supreme Court Justice Tom C. Clark in the Loyola University Law Review for April, 1969, in which Justice Clark concluded from a study of Griswold (striking down Connecticut statute forbidding use of contraceptives) and its predecessor cases:

> "The results of these decisions is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution."

Quoting further from the language of the court in Babbitz:

> "The defendants urge that the state's interest in protecting the embryo is a sufficient basis to sustain the statute. Upon a balancing of the relevant interest, we hold that a woman's right to refuse to carry an embryo during the early months of pregnancy may not be invaded by the state without a more compelling public necessity than is reflected in the statute in question. When measured against the claimed "rights" of an embryo of four months or less, we hold that the mother's right transcends that of such an embryo."

The court went on to find no compelling interest of society in the need to protect the mother's life, since abortion is presently less dangerous than childbirth, or in connection with the discouragement of non-marital sexual intercourse. In fact, most abortions are sought by married women and the laws do not purport to distinguish between married and unmarried women.

Accordingly, defendant's motion for dismissal of the information filed herein will be granted on the grounds that the abortion statute is an unconstitutional invasion of individual right, without a compelling interest in the State.

Counsel for the defendant may prepare an order accordingly.

By the Court:

OPINION - MARCH 30, 1970

This is the case of the PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN vs. DR. JESSE KETCHUM AND JUDITH KETCHUM. The Defendants are charged with the crime of CONSPIRACY TO PERFORM AN ABORTION, contrary to M.S.A. 28.773 and M.S.A. 28.204.

At the beginning of the preliminary examination, Mr. John Bai ttorney for the Defendants made an oral motion to dismiss the complaint and warrant on the grounds that the Michigan statute on abortion is unconstitutional because it is indefinite and uncertain and vague and therefore is in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

This Court recognizes that the issues raised in this proceeding have far reaching moral implications, theological implications, and medical implications. However, this Court will address itself solely to the legal issues raised in the motion.

Nei ther the Defendants' attorney nor the prosecuting attorney have cited to this Court any Michigan Supreme Court decision nor any Court of Appeals decision which have previously held this statute constitutional so therefore this Court is not bound by any prior decisions.

Due process of law requires a penal statute to use clear, explicit, and unambiguous terminology so that men of common intelligence may not differ as to its meaning and application. See Connelly vs. General Construction Company 269 U.S. 385 and Lanzetta vs. New Jersey 306 U.S. 468.

It is the applicable terminology of the Michigan abortion statute "unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman" clear, explicit, and unambiguous? The three key words "necessary," "preserve," and "life" taken individually by both judicial interpretation and dictionary definitions create uncertainty as to their individual meaning. The entire phrase in itself is susceptible to a variety of interpretations. This Court concludes that the terminology is not sufficiently clear, and explicit and does not satisfy the due process requirements without infringing on fundamental rights. See People vs. Belous, 80 Calif. Reporter 354, and The United States vs. Vuitch 38 LW 2275.

The Michigan statute provides for the standard of "any person... with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of any such woman, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of said woman." The standard allows "any person" to decide who shall be born and who shall not be born. Certainly our country is established and maintained on the principle of the rule of law - a nation of laws and not of men. The standard "any person" provides no procedural guidelines. Is not the decision as to who shall or shall not be born a decision in which society has an interest and not a decision to be made conclusively by "any person" without any guidelines to protect the basic rights of the parties involved?

Is there an infringement on the basic rights of the parties as protected under the Fourteenth Amendment? The Court believes that the parties involved include the woman, the unborn, and any person who is performing the abortion. The woman certainly has a right to life as opposed to the risks of death in childbirth. The woman has a right to privacy in matters relating to marriage, family and sex. See Griswold vs. Connecticut 381 U.S. 479. The real issue is whether the state has a compelling interest in the regulation of the right to privacy in matters of marriage, family, and sex. Currently accepted standards of medical practice negate the original compelling interest of the state because the need of the state to protect the woman's health when the abortion statute was originally enacted is no longer evident in light of scientific advancements.

The Court believes that the unborn person may be a person under the Constitution, and thereby shall not be deprived of life without due process of law. In Michigan the unborn child has the right to maintain a tort action, to sue for wrongful death of its parents after its birth. The right to property by means of inheritance. The right to a guardian ad litem in certain actions. Does not the unborn child have an absolute right to life - the right to be born? The Michigan statute as written does not provide for the taking of the life of the unborn person with due process of law.

In addition the statute as written infringes on the right of privacy in the physician-patient relationship, and may violate the patient's right to safe and adequate medical advice and treatment.

Thus this Court finds that the Michigan abortion statute as written is vague and indefinite in its terminology and possible applications as to constitute a denial of due process as protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution and the Michigan Constitution of 1963 Art. a Sec. 17, and that it infringes on the basic rights of privacy of the woman, and the basic right of life of the unborn person, and infringes upon the right to privacy between physician and patient, without a sufficient state interest in abridging the right of privacy and the right of life. This Court declares the Michigan abortion statute unconstitutional as a denial of due process of law as protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution and Art. 1 Sec. 17 of the Michigan Constitution. In view of the foregoing, this Court finds it unnecessary to consider the other arguments raised by defense counsel. The motion to dismiss the complaint and warrant is granted.

Order of the District Court, Second Judicial District, County of Ramsey, Denying Motion to Dismiss Indictment Against Appellant Jane E. Hodgson, M.D., Entered June 29, 1970

DISTRICT COURT
STATE OF MINNESOTA

COUNTY OF RAMSEY—SECOND JUDICIAL DISTRICT

File No. 23789

STATE OF MINNESOTA,

vs.

DR. JANE ELIZABETH HODGSON.

The defendant is accused by the grand jury of the County of Ramsey in an indictment returned on May 21, 1970, of the crime of abortion, in that she, the defendant, intentionally produced a miscarriage of one, Jane Doe, which said miscarriage was not necessary to preserve the life of the said Jane Doe nor the child with which she was pregnant. The defendant's first appearance in court was on May 26, 1970, at which time she appeared with her Counsel, Stewart R. Perry, and indicated to the Court that her appearance was a special appearance for the purpose of moving the Court for an order dismissing the indictment for the reason and upon the ground that the statute under which the indictment was returned was unconstitutional. The date of June 12, 1970, was then set as the time for hearing, and the requests to file briefs by both the State and the defendant were granted by the Court.

On June 12, 1970, the defendant, together with her Counsel, appeared before the Court to argue the above described motion. The County Attorney was represented by Mr. Paul Lindholm, Assistant Ramsey County Attorney. In the interim, briefs had been submitted by Mr. Perry and by Mr. Stephen C. DeCoster, Assistant Ramsey County Attorney.

Upon all of the files, records, and proceedings had and filed in said matter, briefs and arguments of Counsel, and after due consideration of the same,

IT IS ORDERED:

1. That the motion brought by defendant to dismiss the indictment returned against her in the above entitled matter be and the same hereby is denied.

2. That the request of the defendant to certify the above entitled matter to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota as important and doubtful be and the same hereby is denied.

3. That the defendant will appear before the Court on August 5, 1970, prepared to proceed with her arraignment.

Judge of the District Court

Dated June 29, 1970.

MEMORANDUM

The statute in question, MSA 617.18, was first enacted into law by the Minnesota legislature in the year 1873. As far as can be ascertained, this is the first constitutional challenge of the statute, and the issues presented in this motion have not been decided in this jurisdiction. The Court has taken judicial notice of the materials cited in the briefs, but they are of such common understanding that they need not be elaborated on here in great detail.

The undisputed facts appear to be that Jane Doe, a married woman, of the age of 23 years, was a patient of the defendant, and on April 14, 1970, was diagnosed as being pregnant. From the medical history obtained, it was suspected that Jane Doe had contracted rubella during the first four weeks of her pregnancy, and that Jane Doe had come to the defendant because she suspected that she had rubella during that period of time. She was apprehensive about her condition, particularly her unborn child, because of her knowledge of the dangerous propensities of the disease. The history of rubella given by Jane Doe was confirmed by clinical observations and laboratory tests on two of her children who at that time had the disease, the examination and tests being performed by a pediatrician located in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Upon the tests having been made, together with examinations in connection therewith, the defendant was of the opinion that Jane Doe had rubella during the first four weeks of her pregnancy. Jane Doe and her husband were aware of the danger to the fetus because of the contraction of the disease and requested the defendant to perform an abortion. The defendant believed in her medical judgment that a therapeutic abortion was medically indicated, and she secured consultations from other members of her profession in the community and in other parts of the United States, resulting in the performance of the abortion in a hospital located in Ramsey County, Minnesota, on April 29, 1970. At that time Jane Doe was about 12 weeks pregnant, and the fetus was not viable or "quick." Before proceeding with the operation, the defendant brought a motion in the United States District Court, District of Minnesota, seeking, essentially, the same relief here presented. A three-judge court denied the motion of the defendant and indicated that she seek her relief in the courts of the State of Minnesota. Because of the lack of time, the defendant proceeded with the operation, rather than first seek her relief in the district courts of the State.

The issues presented cover three, general, broad areas. First, whether or not the State has the right to interfere with the private rights of an individual; two, if the State does have such right, it must have an overriding and compelling interest to justify any such interference with the private life of an individual; and, three, if there is an overriding State interest present today that justifies the existence of MSA 617.18, it is incumbent upon the State to establish such interest.

The Court will touch upon the constitutional issues raised by defendant as they pertain to these three general areas.

Defendant contends that the statute infringes upon the personal liberties of the individual concerned, in that it interferes with a woman's right of privacy in determining whether she will or will not, or should or should not, allow to grow within her body embryo which she does not wish to grow, and that in order for the State to interfere, there must be shown a reasonable basis, an overriding justification, a social purpose of such interference. Defendant further contends that at the time of its enactment, in the year 1873, there was an urgent and well-founded health basis for its passage. Any surgical intrusion into the body was, at that time, highly dangerous. Infection was almost insured, and mortality was high. Defendant argues that today an abortion performed under proper circumstances is a reasonably safe procedure, even safer than normal childbirth. No doubt these considerations were in the mind of our legislators almost a century ago when the law was first enacted. However, the statute has been periodically reconsidered over the years, most recently at the last legislative session. Whatever the dangers of surgery the legislators might have had in mind during the early years of the history of this law, those considerations have seemed [sic] to have disappeared during recent years, and the law is still on the books. The reason for its existence is not because of dangers of surgery or performing an abortion, medically speaking. Some considerations for the continued existence of the law are hereinafter discussed.

Defendant places great emphasis on the fact that the State of Minnesota has never considered an embryo or fetus as a "human being." Defendant further contends that the statute in question denies the rights of the Father or the Mother of the aborted foetus to privacy in contravention of the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. There is authority to the effect that the unborn child, even before it becomes viable, is an entity which the legislature is empowered to protect. In early recorded history, the child in the Mother's womb was considered a part of its Mother. Reference is made to Roman law, see Justinian, Digest 25.4.1.1. But since that early date we have seen the development of scientific methods to such an extent that the ancient law has been reconsidered, and no longer is the fetus considered to be a plant, static in habit, and growing only in size. Through the marvels of closed-circuit x ray and television, scientific observations of this little human being during his first weeks of existence have been made possible. Studies of mental growth have been made possible, during the first few weeks of the child's existence. Some studies have indicated that even in the limb bud stage, when the embryo is only four weeks old, there is evidence of behavior pattern: the heart beats. In two or more weeks, slow back and forth movements of the arms and legs appear. Before the 12th week of uterine life, the fingers flex in reflex graphs. From the studies of certain child psychologists, it has been disclosed that the process of mental development which characterizes a 10-year old child or the one-year old child also characterizes the embryo who might be only one month old. Hence, it would appear that the time has been reached when society must discard the theory advanced by the old Roman law, that a parent has an absolute dominion over his offspring, or a return to the ancient notion that a fetus is "part" of his Mother. The Minnesota legislature has made no such distinction, nor has it attempted to set out by law at what stage during pregnancy a child may be considered "quick" or "viable" nor has it at anytime determined at what stage during pregnancy the life of a child can or could be taken for any reason or means. Rather, the legislature has decreed that a miscarriage shall not be caused at anytime during pregnancy unless the same is effected as necessary to preserve the life of the Mother or the life of the child. The State has an interest in the continued existence of every life.

Defendant contends that unless the fetus in question is "quick" or viable, the unborn child has no legal rights in the State of Minnesota. The rights of the unborn child are specifically recognized by Minnesota law in its various fields, such as: intestate succession; testate successions; trusts and uses; workmen's compensation; paternity and support; land registration; and future interests in real property. Various quotations make reference to "unborn child" and "posthumous child," "lives in being," "twenty-one years and nine months," but the law is entirely lacking with respect to definitions of "quick child" or "viable child." The Court recognizes there are rules and regulations promulgated by the State Department of Health pursuant to MSA 144.151 (4) to the effect that destroying a fetus is not considered a fetal death if aborted for any reason less than 20 weeks after conception. See Registration Manual for Birth and Fetal Death, State Board of Health (1965), Section 5, page 14. However, such regulations and publications are not considered decisive case law, nor are they controlling in the instant matter. Turning our attention to the field of tort law, the first time that the Minnesota State Supreme Court was called upon to pass upon the issue of the right of the heirs of an unborn child to recover in a wrongful death action was in 1949. See Berkenes vs. Corniea (1949) 229 Minn. 365, 38 N.W. (2) 838. It is noted that the Court, in part of its opinion, quoted Blackstone as follows:

> "The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health and his reputation. Life is the immediate gift of God—a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins, in contemplation of law, as soon as an infant is able to stir in the Mother's womb."

The Court further quotes the case of Bonbrest vs. Kotz (D.C.) 65 Fed. Supp. 138:

"From the viewpoint of the civil law and the law of property, a child en bentra [sic] sa mere is not only regarded as a human being, but as much [sic] from the moment of conception—which it is in fact."

While it is true that the child in the Berkenes case had reached a viable state, it is noted that the Court made no distinction between a viable or nonviable child, that is, it does not appear that had the child not been viable, recovery would have been denied. There is substantial authority in other jurisdictions which allow recovery for prenatal injuries to nonviable, unborn children. There appears to be no holding or decision to the effect that would allow a shifting of standards in certain cases. There appears to be no reason to allow a distinction to be made, based upon age of the child within the womb. The dean of tort law, Professor Prosser, states at Section 56:

"Certainly the infant may be no less injured, and all logic is in favor of ignoring the stage at which it occurs."

If the State legislature has seen fit to give the right of recovery to an unborn child or his heirs at various stages during pregnancy in the civil field, why should the child be abandoned at certain stages of pregnancy in the criminal field? If the unborn child at age 12 weeks within the womb has vested rights or the right in certain instances to recover, as hereinabove set forth and described, why should any person be deemed competent to judge that the child's twelve-week life may be taken because of the wishes of its Mother or Father, or because it is unwanted, or because of the possibility of its being deformed or handicapped because of exposure to certain diseases during the early stages of life? Defendant would ask this Court to so legislate, contrary to what has taken place in the halls of our legislature for generations past. For the reasons hereinafter enumerated, this Court does not so choose to do.

Defendant alleges that the statute in question, MSA 617.18, today is based on the concept of "morality and decency" arising from religious laws in violation of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. Defendant then points out that these individuals who rely on the position of morality and decency overlook the end results where abortion is not allowed. That is to say, they overlook those children who are being born with gross defects, who must live with them day by day, while those who would preach morality and decency are prompted by it only on occasions where their attention is drawn to what someone else is doing. Defendant further points out that these people overlook the institutions in Minnesota filled with mentally retarded people whose life is tragic, and that they overlook the daily pain that the parents and siblings of such children live, day by day. They further overlook the unwanted children in institutions and overlook the children who are periodically in hospitals with the "battered child syndrome." Defendant contends that it is immoral and indecent not to prevent this, and that it is immoral and indecent to force these institutions to exist.

Where the statute involved deals with conduct which the State has valid grounds to prohibit, that is, the taking of the life of an unborn child, the fact that its policies coincide with the views of certain religious groups is without constitutional significance. It is almost inevitable that any position taken by the State through its legislature on the subject of abortion must correspond with the religious or moral views of some group or groups within the community. In passing such a law, the legislature did not intend that it establish a religion in contravention of the First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. This subject has been the concern of philosophers and theologians since recorded history has begun. The relationship between religion, morality, and law, perhaps, is difficult to clearly define. However, history teaches that they do overlap in the subjects of their concern. An historical study of the works of our legislative bodies will clearly indicate that many men in their respective roles as legislators were committed to the proposition that the ultimate source of law is from the ultimate Lawgiver Himself. Many have clearly indicated that a just law binds one's conscience, and if a law does not bind one in conscience, it should not be law. There are numerous references in the Old Testament as to the source of our law, among which are the Book of Proverbs, Chapter 8, and Exodus, Chapter 24. Five thousand years ago Hammurabi recognized a supernatural source of authority, and the same reference is also made to Solon, the great leader of freedom-loving Greeks. It seems that down through the centuries, men have further recognized the authority for law and would keep those convictions alive in various forms in the halls of their legislatures. Seven hundred years ago Henry Bracton wrote:

> "The king is under God and the law. When the king or dictator or the State is held above God and the law, liberty is never secure, and the rights of man are mere franchises subject to the whims of other men."

In more modern times these same thoughts might have inspired our great leaders, such as Thomas Jefferson, when he wrote:

> "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Society would reach a strange position in its history if the legislatures of the several states were forbidden from making illegal that which is also immoral according to one's religion, or, indeed, all religions, on the grounds of the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Under such restrictions society might then return to a state of chaos, even barbarianism. The Court recognizes the sincere views of the defendant in this field, and the remarks hereinabove set forth are not in criticism or ridicule of those views or beliefs. The Court is also cognizant of the views of the minority in our various communities who have views which coincide with those of the defendant in this area. However, to give effect to those views of the defendant or the minority, the Court again is called upon to legislate, and for the reasons hereinafter set forth, the Court will not undertake such a responsibility. The Court is also not unmindful of the anxiety of the Mother in this case. Having been exposed to German measles, she was apprehensive of the possibility of bearing or giving birth to a deformed or handicapped child. Instead of agreeing to take the child's life because of this possible exposure, might she not have at least better yielded to the argument of a segment of our society who would state:

"Let the child run its normal period of gestation, and upon birth if it is found that the child will be a burden to its parents or society, then provisions may be taken for its destruction."

The very thought of such argument, perhaps, appears abhorrent to responsible members of our community, but wherein lies the difference? At what stage in the course of human existence, or development, can it be decreed that life should be taken because of the potential inability to perform as normal persons are expected? Society is increasingly concerned with those who have been blessed with healthy bodies, and prefer to serve themselves, and blame society, rather than serve society and honor themselves. Society has never forgotten, nor should it ever forget, that men and women with withered limbs and bodies became outstanding citizens, leaders in their communities, but above all, masters of themselves, while other healthy, vigorous, intelligent individuals, warped within the philosophy of excuse, for one reason or another, have become instruments of their own damnation.

Defendant asserts that the statute in question interferes with the right of privacy of women in violation of the Ninth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The Court agrees that legislation of this type might and can interfere with the right of privacy of certain individuals. This is true with many of the laws of today. A simple illustration concerns the matters of traffic regulations involving the use of a motor vehicle upon the highway. Many such rules and regulations or statutes interfere with the manner in which a person might desire to operate a motor vehicle, but in the protection of life and property, legislative safeguards have been provided, many of which interfere daily with the rights of individuals. The same problem exists with many other types of legislation. For instance, there are still on the books laws against adultery and fornication, and how intoxicants and narcotics shall be used. These laws are considered by a substantial minority to be archaic in design, and no longer serve a useful purpose in a modern and developing society. However, it is clearly noted that our legislature over the years has not yielded to such arguments and philosophies. This Court does not agree that the statute in question relative to abortion is in violation of the Ninth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Defendant asserts that the statute in question interferes with the right of a medical doctor to practice medicine in the highest standards thereof in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The Court agrees that the right to pursue one's profession is a constitutionally protected right within the concept of "liberty" and "property." However, it is also noted that medical opinion is divided as to the situations under which a therapeutic abortion is medically indicated. If the State cannot constitutionally regulate the exercise of that judgment, legislators and courts alike would be superfluous, supplanted by a wise elite of doctors. In a democratic society, trust cannot be placed with a body of experts to determine issues of life and death, however qualified, well-motivated, and devoted the experts may be.

Defendant further contends that the statute delegates to the physician the duty and risk of deciding whether the abortion is necessary to preserve the life of the Mother or child and thus violates the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. Defendant points out the difficulty here is that the doctor must decide whether or not the abortion is necessary to preserve the life of the patient, and she apparently has difficulty interpreting the word "preserve." Defendant alleges that it is incumbent upon her to make the right decision as to whether or not an abortion is necessary to preserve the life and is thus placed in a conflict of interests; that is, caught between the decision to do the abortion and the fear that if something should go wrong, the matter would be brought to the attention of the police. Thereafter, the doctor must then justify her opinion at a trial. Hence, she jeopardizes her practice and runs the risk of prosecution whenever the decision is made to perform an abortion, where there is any question that medical opinion could differ as to whether or not the operation was necessary to preserve the life of the Mother or the child. This Court, upon examination of the statute, is not persuaded that the words are indefinite or vague. In the Court's opinion, the word "necessary" and the expression "to preserve the life of the Mother" are both reasonably comprehensible in their meaning. The United States Supreme Court has ruled that a criminal statute must be definite enough to acquaint those who are subject to it with the conduct which will render them liable to its penalties. See Lanzetta vs. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 59 S. Ct. 618, 83 L. PB. [sic] 888 (1939). And also see Connolly [sic] vs. General Construction Company, 68 [sic] U.S. 385, 46 S. Ct. 126, 17 L. PB. [sic] 322 (1926). This Court is of the opinion that the statute sets forth with reasonable clarity and sufficient particularity the kind of conduct which will constitute a violation. It is interesting to note that the defendant challenges the words "necessary to preserve her life" as being vague. The Court is not unmindful that the dedicated medical profession assumes this responsibility without hesitation almost daily in its various practices. It is deeply interesting to note that the statute in question has been law for a period of almost 100 years, and until the present time no one has challenged the provisions of the statute as being indefinite or vague. The Court cannot agree with the defendant that the statute involves a delegation of legislative responsibility. The legislature has simply set a certain standard, and that is, that no abortion shall be carried out unless necessary to preserve the life of the Mother, and then requires that the individual condition his or or her conduct on a respect for the standard as set. It would appear that the requirements laid out are no more burdensome than those which are established by any criminal law. Such a requirement placed upon the individual is, in no sense, a delegation of legislative responsibility.

The State contends that there are valid policy reasons underlying the statute in question; therefore, the doctrine of separation of legislative and judicial functions and the long-settled judicial rule of reticence in substituting the Court's own notions of legislative wisdom for that of a democractically elected legislature dictate that the challenged statute be sustained. The question of the validity of anti-abortion legislation is not the only issue of importance here. The issue of separation of legislative and judicial functions is as well involved. Even though a court may go so far as to opine that a particular statute in question be unwise, silly, or even asinine, if it has been demonstrated that the statute in question is reasonably tailored to the protection of societal interests with respect to which the legislature is entitled to act, then such act should not be torn down by a court who differs in opinion, philosophically or socially. This does not mean that there are not policy grounds for a change in abortion laws which were ably stated in defendant's brief and exhibits. What it does mean is that these arguments are more properly addressed to the legislature of this State, and ultimately to its people. This Court is asked to balance the rights of an unborn child against the rights of the Mother, contrary to what the legislature has so consistently stated. Whose rights shall transcend? Who shall balance the relevant interests? This Court is of the opinion that the problem of balancing is more properly the function of the legislature and of the people of the respective states. In the case of Commonwealth vs. Brunell [sic], not yet reported, the Court stated:

> "The subject of abortion has become one of the most controversial social and legal issues of our contemporary society. Reasonable arguments have been advanced both in favor of and against abortion. But when a question is fairly debatable, the courts cannot substitute their judgment on it for that of the legislature." Citing Druzik vs. Board of Health of Aberhill, 324 Mass. 129. "It is only when a legislative determination cannot be supported upon any rational basis of fact that a court can strike it down. If the law on abortion is not as responsive to felt needs as the people believe contemporary life demands, the remedy rests with a democratically elected legislature and not with the court."

Defendant requests the Court that the statute in question be found constitutional but to then certify the matter to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota pursuant to MSA 632.10 for a determination of the constitutionality of the statute prior to trial. This would obviate the necessity of raising the defense that she might have, relative to a verdict of innocence or guilt, and would at the same time give statewide effect to the ruling on constitutionality. If the Court in the local instance should find the statute unconstitutional, that ends the matter, and there would be no statewide effect of that local decision. Defendant also points out to the Court that a conviction, including a plea of guilty, would be most serious and would place her professional standing in jeopardy. She feels that if the matter should go to trial at the local level without a Supreme Court determination as to constitutionality, then her whole plan becomes moot inasmuch as she will be put to the task of defending herself against the charge brought by the grand jury, and if she is successful at the trial on the merits, again, the matter would not have any statewide impact.

In the light of the foregoing observations and conclusions drawn by the Court, it is obvious that the matter cannot be certified to the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota, as important and doubtful. The Court believes that the issue or matter is important, but in this Court's opinion the constitutionality of the act in question is not in doubt. Under the circumstances, the Court has no alternative but to order that this matter proceed pursuant to the ordinary rules and processes of our criminal procedures.

The Court is not unmindful of the standing of the defendant in her community, her reputation as a citizen and as a dedicated physician and surgeon, and the Court is not unmindful of the serious position that she is in pursuant to the charge brought against her. However, it is she who chose to violate the law, and she certainly must have been cognizant of the consequences that might follow. In the opinion of some of her professional colleagues as well as many in this community she will be considered as a very courageous and dedicated person in choosing the course of conduct that she did. Conversely, there will be other members of her profession and members of our community who do not and will not agree with her. Unfortunately, this Court cannot be a part of any plan or procedure other than those duly provided by law. No exception can be made in any case, even though a court might be in sympathy with the actions taken by the defendant.

The regular and ordinary criminal procedure processes established by law and within this Court's responsibility, require that the defendant be ordered to appear for her arraignment, which has been set for August 5th, next. Defendant will then have to decide whether to bring the matter on for trial relative to the issue of her innocence or guilt of the crime as charged or to enter a plea of guilty, and rest her future standing in the hope that the Supreme Court of the State will take a contrary view to that expressed herein.

Item No. 38

Commonwealth of Massachusetts

Middlesex, ss. Superior Court
No. 83879

COMMONWEALTH

v.

PIERRE VICTOR BRUNELLE

DECISION ON DEFENDANT'S SUBSTITUTE MOTION TO DISMISS

The defendant has been indicted for an alleged violation of G. L. c. 272, sec. 19, the so-called abortion statute. The indictment charges that he "with intent to procure the miscarriage of Linda A. Phillips, did unlawfully use a certain instrument upon the body of said Linda A. Phillips."

After pleading not guilty, the defendant filed a substitute motion to dismiss the indictment on the ground that the statute he is charged with violating is unconstitutional. At the hearing of this motion, evidence was received from experts in the fields of medicine and psychiatry. The motion sets out ten grounds on which the statute is claimed to be unconstitutional. Some of these grounds will be discussed separately; others will be grouped together.

I.

The Claim that the Statute violates the First Amendment and the Fourteenth Amendment in that it establishes a Religious Position Peculiar to one Religion.

The defendant contends, in substance, that the statute effects an establishment of religion because it enacts into law the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church on the subject of abortion. Quite properly, the defendant does not contend that the original abortion statute enacted in 1845 (St. 1845, c. 27) was passed as a result of pressure by the Catholic Church or for the purpose of giving a Catholic moral position the force of law. But the defendant does contend that the effect of retaining in force G. L. c. 272, sec. 19 "is to enact into law theological tenets of some organized religions in this most important area of human life." (Defendant's Brief, p. 18). Two answers may be given to this argument.

First, the Massachusetts statute, as construed by the Supreme Judicial Court, is not in accord with the Catholic view on abortion. See Code of Cannon Law, 2350, sec. 1; Tinnelly, Abortion and the Penal Law, 5 Catholic Lawyer 187, 190. Second, there in no factual basis for any claim that the present purpose of the statute is to give legal effect to any particular religious viewpoint or that in its operation the statute does have that effect. It is almost inevitable that any position taken by the state through its legislature on the subject of abortion must correspond with the religious or moral views of some group within the community. The fact that a law coincides with a religious view does not render that law an unconstitutional establishment of religion. For example, the fact that Sunday is a day of particular significance for the dominant Christian sects does not bar the state from achieving the secular goal of requiring the observance of Sunday as a day of rest. McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420; Gallagher v. Crown Kosher Super Market, 366 U.S. 617. If the state decides that it is in the public interest to restrict abortions to situations involving the life or health of pregnant women, it is not forbidden to do so because that view corresponds with the moral views of a majority or of a minority in the community.

The defendant's argument that the abortion statute violates the free exercise clause of the first amendment is without merit for, while the freedom to hold religious beliefs is absolute, the freedom to act upon those beliefs may be limited where there is a substantial state interest. Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599. The interest of the state in protecting what it considers to be human life would appear to be at least as substantial as any interest in maintaining Sunday as a day of rest. See Raleigh Pitkin-Paul Morgan Mem. Hosp. v. Anderson, 42 N.J. 421, 201A.2d 537, cert. den. 377 U.S. 985 (1964).

II.

The Claim that the Statute Violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Massachusetts Constitution, Part 2, C. I, Article IV, in that it is Arbitrary, Irrational, and Not Suited to Achieve any Valid Legislative End.

It is quite probable that the original Massachusetts statute on abortion when enacted in 1845 had as its primary purpose the protection of the health of the mother. At that time an abortion was attended by grave risk to the life and health of the pregnant woman. Due to advances in the last century in medical science and techniques, an abortion today, carried out by a competent physician in an accredited hospital, involves no more risk to the mother than continued pregnancy and childbirth. It is still true, however, that abortions performed by non-medical persons involve serious risks to the life and health of the woman.

The defendant argues that since there is little danger, comparatively speaking, to the health of the mother in the case of an abortion performed by a properly trained physician, there is no valid state interest served by proscribing an abortion by such a physician even though the abortion may not be necessary to preserve the woman's life or health. In other words, it is argued, the state may not validly deprive a pregnant woman of the right to an abortion requested by her when the only ground of such proscription is the moral one of protecting the fetus.

At the outset, it may be doubted whether the defendant has standing to raise the issue of the constitutional right of a woman not to bear children. It does not appear that the defendant is a duly licensed physician. On a motion to dismiss I cannot assume that he is or is not so licensed. It is rather obvious that the state has the power to forbid persons who are unlicensed physicians to perform abortions. The risk to the health of the mother from allowing unlicensed persons to practice medicine would alone be an adequate ground for the state intervening.

Assuming, however, that the defendant does have standing to raise these issues, I shall deal with them on their merits. There can be no doubt that the abortion statute, although broadly construed by the Supreme Judicial Court, does restrict the liberty of action of a pregnant woman who seeks an abortion solely for personal or social or economic reasons. The question is whether this restraint on her liberty is justified by any compelling state interest. The Commonwealth asserts that the state has a justifiable and overriding interest in protecting the embryo or fetus and that the desire of the woman must be subordinated to this public interest. The basic question posed is whether the legislature may validly regulate the extermination of human life at an early state of its development.

The evidence before me clearly establishes that the product of human conception -- whether it be in the stage of zygote, embryo, or fetus -- may properly be classified as human life. It is not potential human life, but actual human life. The zygote contains within itself the genetic package that will control its development during its life in the womb and in the world. It is uniquely different from any other part of its mother's body. It is a human being in and of itself in the sense that it is an individual entity human in origin, human in its characteristics, and human in its destiny. Whether it is proper to describe this entity as a human person is a matter of disagreement. The law has not, at least as yet, given full recognition as a juristic person to the embryo or fetus. To a limited extent the fetus has been granted rights as a person, contingent on its birth. Torigian v. Watertown News Co. Inc., 352 Mass. 446; Meyes v. Construction Service, Inc., 340 Mass. 633. Cf. Dietrich v. Northampton, 138 Mass. 14. It is difficult to accept the view that because the state has not fully recognized the unborn child as a legal person it lacks power to extend any protection to the fetus or embryo. Although there is some authority to this effect (People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194; United States v. Vuitch, 305 F. Supp. 1032), it is of questionable weight here in view of the different statutes under consideration in those cases. Protection of life has traditionally been one of the first duties owed by a state to its people. To say that the state has no interest in life prior to birth except as the mother may choose to permit the state to have an interest is to accept a proposition that contradicts the action of every state legislature. In this area of competing values, if the legislature sees fit to make a choice in favor of life, I find nothing in the federal or state constitution that says that such a choice is forbidden.

III.

The Claim that the Statute Infringes the Right of Privacy of a Pregnant Woman Desiring an Abortion.

The defendant contends that G. L. c. 272, sec. 19, not only invalidly restrains the liberty of a pregnant woman to bear or not bear a child, but that it also invades her constitutionally protected right of privacy. It is argued that her right to plan her reproductive life and her family as she sees fit is within a protected zone of privacy under the first, ninth, and fourteenth amendments of the constitution. Again, there is a question of the defendant's right to raise such an issue in the absence, at least, of evidence of his status as a duly licensed physician. But laying aside this objection, I rule that the claim is without substantial merit.

A nebulous concept of right of marital privacy found recognition in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479. In that case the Supreme Court struck down the Connecticut contraception statute. The defendant argues that, analogously, the abortion statute as applied to married women invades a constitutionally protected right of a married woman to the control of her reproductive faculties. Some support for this view can be found in the two abortion cases previously cited, People v. Belous, supra, and United States v. Vuitch, supra. However, there is a distinction between the state's attempted regulation of the marital use of contraceptives and the regulation of abortion. The state's interest in the protection of embryonic and fetal life, absent in the Griswold situation, is crucial to the abortion issue.

It may be added that it does not appear whether the woman named in this indictment as the subject of the abortion was married or unmarried.

IV.

The Argument that the Statute is Void on its Face because of its Vagueness.

The Statute in full (G. L. c. 272, sec. 19) reads as follows:

"Whoever, with the intent to procure the miscarriage of a woman, unlawfully administers to her, or advises or prescribes for her, or causes any poison, drug, medicine or other noxious thing to be taken by her or, with the like intent, unlawfully uses any insturment or other means whatever, or with like intent, aids or assists therein, shall, if she dies in consequence thereof, be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than five nor more than twenty years; and, if she does not die in consequence thereof, by imprisonment in the state prison for not more than seven years and by a fine of not more than two thousand dollars."

It is an established constitutional principle that "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process ..." Connelly v. Central Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391; Lansetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451. The broad language of the Massachusetts statute, if taken literally and without clarifying judicial construction, might well be open to the charge of vagueness. But the statute has been construed by the Supreme Judicial Court and has been given a specific content that provides adequate guidelines to physicians. Decisions of that court have held that a duly licensed physician may lawfully procure the abortion of a patient if he acts in good faith and in an honest belief that it is necessary for the preservation of her life or to prevent serious impairment of her health, mental or physical, and if his judgment corresponds with the general opinion of physicians in the community in which he practices. Commonwealth v. Wheeler, 315 Mass. 394; Commonwealth v. Nason, 252 Mass. 545; Commonwealth v. Brunelle, 341 Mass. 675.

Moreover, the question is not an open one in this Commonwealth. In Kudish v. Board of Registration, Mass. Adv. Sh. (1969) 883 it was held that the statute was not void for vagueness. Two courts have recently utilized the void-for-vagueness principle to strike down abortion statutes which contained an exception permitting abortion when necessary to preserve the life of the mother in one case, and when necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother in the other case. People v. Belous, supra; United States v. Vuitch, supra. But in neither of these cases was the statute so construed as to give decisive weight to the good-faith judgment of the physician.

The statute, as construed by the Supreme Judicial Court, is no more vague than many traditional concepts of the law such as murder, manslaughter, criminal negligence, and the right of self-defense.

V.

The Claim that the Statute Infringes on the Constitutional Right of Free Speech and on the Freedom of Physicians to Practice their Profession.

The defendant contends that the abortion statute violates his constitutional right of free speech in that it makes criminal the mere conveying of information to a person, knowing that the person can utilize the information to procure an abortion. Also, the defendant claims that the statute unduly interferes with the freedom of the physician to practice his profession, according to his best medical knowledge.

The statute as applied to the defendant raises no question of freedom of speech or the rights of physicians to practice their profession. He is not charged with advising or prescribing an abortion. He is charged with unlawfully using an instrument on the body of a woman with intent to procure an abortion. Hypothetically, it is possible to imagine a situation in which a serious question of first-amendment rights may arise in the application of the statute, but this defendant lacks standing to raise it. Moreover, since it does not appear that he is a licensed physician, he is not entitled to come forward as the champion of the medical profession. As to the power of the state to regulate that profession, see Kudish v. Board of Registration, supra; Lawrence v. Board of Registration, 239 Mass. 424.

Some miscellaneous arguments advanced by the defendant do not require detailed treatment. For example, the defendant contends that the statute is an invidious discrimination against the poor in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the fourteenth amendment in that the poor cannot afford to hire physicians or psychiatrists who can legally prescribe therapeutic abortion. The stature is nondiscriminatory on its face. To the extent that it may be discriminatory in operation, the cause is economic, not legal. If a remedy is needed, it lies with the medical profession and the legislature, not with the courts.

The defendant also complains that the statute subjects those who violate it to cruel and unusual punishment. This contention is without merit. A legislature is not required to fix or impose any particular penalty for a crime. The penalties set out in the statute cannot be said to be wholly disproportionate to the gravity of the evil which the legislature could deem to result from illegal abortions. In any case, the defendant has neither been convicted or sentenced. It will be time enough to consider the issue if and when it becomes relevant. See Commonwealth v. Baird, Mass. Adv. Sh. (1969) 727, 247 N.E. 2d 574; Commonwealth v. Leis, Mass. Adv. Sh. (1969) 97, 243 N.E. 2d 898.

CONCLUSION

The subject of abortion has become one of the most controversial social and legal issues of our contemporary society. Reasonable arguments have been advanced both in favor of and against abortion. But when a question is fairly debatable, courts cannot substitute their judgment on it for that of the legislature. Drusik v. Board of Health of Haverhill, 324 Mass. 120. It is only when a legislative discrimination cannot be supported upon any rational basis of fact that a court can strike it down. If the law on abortion is not as responsive to felt needs as the people believe contemporary life demands, the remedy rests with a democratically elected legislature and not with the courts.

The defendant's substitute motion to dismiss is denied.

LEGAL COMMENTARY

RELIGION, MORALITY, AND ABORTION: A CONSTITUTIONAL APPRAISAL

*by Mr. Justice Tom C. Clark

Thought without action is an abortion; action without thought is folly.[1]

Our society is currently in the midst of a sexual revolution which has cast the problem of abortion into the forefront of religious, medical, and legal thought. In my day at the bar all discussion of abortion was taboo. For more than sixty years the American Medical Association had a negative policy respecting abortion. The A.M.A. often sought the prosecution of any doctor who engaged in the practice of abortion, regardless of the merits of the individual situation. Society's general attitude toward abortion was such that the patient was ostracised and the doctor was disgraced. As in so many other facets of its moral code, however, society was hypocritical in its behavior. Despite the public pronouncements against its practice, abortions increased, especially among married women, and judicial action against the participants decreased in proportion.[2]

Some social commentators argue that Freud prepared the way for the Kinsey Report, which in turn set the stage for the sexual permissiveness that Reinhold Niebuhr called "moral anarchism."[3] This permeating permissiveness engendered a need for more efficient birth control methods, such as "the pill," and precipitated the doom of the old hypocrisy.

The law, lagging behind as usual, began to emerge from its quagmire and rid itself of the archaic restraints on abortion. In 1962 the American Law Institute proposed an affirmative policy declaring that the termination of pregnancy is justified whenever (1) its continuance would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother, (2) the child would be born with grave physical or mental defects, or

(3) the pregnancy was the result of rape, incest, or other felonious intercourse.[4]

Within five years of this proposal, the A.M.A. reversed its negative policy and adopted the A.L.I. proposal with only a few nuances.[5] During the next two years, five states liberalized their abortion laws and adopted the A.L.I. proposal.[6]

A further liberalization occurred in Great Britain with the adoption of the 1967 Abortion Act, which permits doctors to consider the mother's "actual or forseeable environment" in deciding whether an abortion is necessary.[7] The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (A.C.O.G.) recently advocated enactment of similar legislation in this country.[8] While the permissiveness of the legislation would contradict existing laws in all states, the A.C.O.G. made it clear that it does not counsel disobedience to the law. It merely recommended liberalization and repeal of inconsistent laws. It did not, however, advocate the legalization of abortion for any unwanted pregnancy or as a population control device.

Various religious, medical, psychological, and legal organizations have been striving to reach some level of accord on the issues involved in promulgating a realistic and acceptable policy toward abortion. Emphasis on this topic is the result of many factors, including the chaotic state of thinking that prevails among the professions and the public, and the medical, emotional, and legal consequences which aborticide has on today's society.

The Christian Medical Society's symposium on controlling human reproduction provides a recent illustration of the disagreement that exists among professionals concerning abortion. Distinguished clerics, psychologists, doctors, and lawyers sought to determine what course of action should be followed. They were unable to answer many important questions, such as: Is the control of human reproduction against the will and spirit of God? At what stage of the gestation period does the fetus acquire human status? What are the constitutional limitations upon the State in prohibiting or limiting the control of reproduction? I ask myself, "Heaven knows; who can tell? Who shall decide when experts disagree?" These and many other questions must be answered if we are to attain our goal of an aborticide policy that is responsive to modern society's needs and desires.[9]

In a recent conference the Association for the Study of Abortion experienced far greater success in agreeing on an aborticide policy. Dr. Robert Hall, President of the Association, said that the conference was designed to "relate what we know about abortion, and to determine what, if any, extent our attitude toward abortion should change with changing times. . . ."[10] The conference reviewed numerous reports dealing with present abortion laws. One of these reports concerned the effect of California's recently liberalized abortion law. It was noted that while the number of therapeutic abortions performed in California hospitals this year will rise from six hundred to about four thousand, there will continue to be some one hundred thousand illegal abortions performed in that state, because doctors are concerned about risking a prison sentence for an incorrect interpretation of ambiguous provisions of the liberalized law.[11] The conference was also informed that psychiatrists and physicians in various states were referring patients to doctors in states which have more liberal abortion laws. This practice renders the availability of legal abortion dependent upon the woman's ability to reach such states.[12] Many doctors admitted privately that they and most of their non-Catholic colleagues perform several illegal abortions each month. Kenneth R. Whittemere reported that his recent interviews revealed that in one small Southern city, women had a choice between "a chiropractor, an antique dealer, a mid-wife, a mechanic and a doctor dissatisfied with his profession to perform the operation."[13]

The Association reached an almost unanimous conclusion that all abortion laws should be abolished and that the right of childbirth should

In substance, the consensus concluded that as to abortion "each case should be considered individually, taking into account the various factors involved and using Christian principles of ethics." It suggested that suitable cases for abortion would fall within the scope of the A.C.O.G. statement, but not including abortion for convenience only or on demand. See CHRISTIAN MED. SOC'Y J. be left to each woman acting on the advice of her doctor. This would have the effect of removing the issue from the hands of the legislatures and the courts, which are virtually helpless to decide an ethical question as controversial and far-reaching as abortion.[14] Whether or not we agree with the Association's recommendations, it is readily apparent at this point that a uniform scheme concerning abortion is highly desirous.

Throughout history religious belief has wielded a vital influence on society's attitude regarding abortion. The religious issues involved are perhaps the most frequently debated aspects of abortion. At the center of the ecclesiastical debate is the concept of "ensoulment" or "personhood," i.e., the time at which the fetus becomes a human organism. The Reverend Joseph F. Donseel of Fordham University admitted that no one can determine with certainty the exact moment at which "ensoulment" occurs, but we must deal with the moral problems of aborting a fetus even if it has not taken place.[15] Many Roman Catholics believe that the soul is a gift of God given at conception. This leads to the conclusion that aborting a pregnancy at any time amounts to the taking of a human life and is therefore against the will of God. Others, including some Catholics, believe that abortion should be legal until the baby is viable, i.e., able to support itself outside the womb. In balancing the evils, the latter conclude that the evil of destroying the fetus is outweighed by the social evils accompanying forced pregnancy and childbirth.[16]

Most civilizations of antiquity prohibited the practice of abortion. Ancient Judaism prohibited birth control except in times of famine.[17] Assyrian law imposed the death penalty upon any person participating in an abortion, including the procurer.[18] Even pagan writers described abortion as an evil act prohibited by law.[19]

The New Testament is devoid of pronouncements bearing directly on the issue of birth control or abortion. The Old Testament, however, does not condemn abortion as a capital offense since the fetus was not regarded as possessing a soul within the Sixth Commandment proscription.[20] It does declare, however, that conception is a gift of God which can be withdrawn at His will.[21] Many theologians today argue that man must not destroy what God has created and that aborting a pregnancy destroys the gift of human life.[22]

The medical profession is far from agreeing on the time at which the fetus becomes a human life. Some physicians argue that abortion should be permitted with impunity at any time up to the sixth month of pregnancy since prior to that time the fetus is no more than a growing plant.[23] On the other hand, many eminent physicians believe that the fertilized ovum has human life from the time of conception.[24] In support of this argument they refer to the International Code of Medical Ethics, which states that a physician will maintain the utmost respect for human life, from the time of its conception. A third view is that the decision to terminate a pregnancy must be made according to the circumstances of the particular case. Among the factors to be considered are the duration of the pregnancy, the physical and mental health of the mother, and the risk of serious fetal abnormality. This places the burden of decision upon the doctor and renders the selection of the physician a governing factor in securing permission to perform a therapeutic abortion.[25]

Sociologists have found themselves in a similar quandary over the issue. Some of these social philosophers argue that man is not merely a chemical machine and that he possesses a soul from the earliest stages of fetal development. Therefore the fetus cannot be destroyed with impunity. The control of human reproduction, according to this view, should concentrate on the prevention of conception rather than on abortion.[26] Other sociologists believe that there is no conclusive evidence or persuasive argument that the fetus is human.[27] Indeed, it cannot interact with other human beings. Therefore, there is no proof of life in the sense that the law contemplates proof of fact.

The moving spirit of the times also raises moral issues that divide the disciplines within themselves. A group of one hundred psychiatrists were questioned on the morality of abortion.[28] Twenty-four agreed that abortion should be available upon demand at an appropriate stage of pregnancy. Fifty-six, however, would require consideration of all of the medical and social factors involved in each case before deciding whether to terminate the pregnancy. Sixteen of those questioned would abort only when actual or threatened maternal disaster was present. Only four expressed other views. While this indicates a vast departure from the Christian concept, it does reveal residuals of morality affecting the opinions of over two-thirds of the group. In other words, over two-thirds of the group would not abort a pregnancy solely on demand.

Despite the fact that religious belief continues to permeate our attitude toward abortion, most people today agree with Justice Holmes that "moral predilections must not be allowed to influence our minds in settling legal distinctions."[29] This is illustrated by the fact that the present change in attitude toward abortion has developed while the need for abortion has diminished as a technique to save the life or health of the mother or to prevent fetal deformities. Despite the medical developments, the demand for abortions has increased astronomically.[30] This indicates a definite change in social mores, which is undoubtedly the result of increased knowledge and use of abortion. This attitude of permissiveness is replacing the hypocrisy that prevailed in the last generation.

A major contributing factor to this change in attitude has been the growing antagonism toward the double standard which permits those with social status and financial ability to obtain abortions, while those in the lower social and economic classes are denied this opportunity. We are in the midst of a worldwide movement to make "the pill" and abortion available in the slums as well as on Fifth Avenue. The statistics illustrate the disparity between the affluent and the nonaffluent. Three counties surrounding San Francisco are relatively affluent. These counties account for sixteen per cent of the live births and fifty per cent of the abortions in California. The less affluent Los Angeles County with its widespread slum areas accounts for sixty per cent of the live births and twenty-three per cent of the abortions in California.[31] These facts demonstrate quite clearly that the affluent areas account for a number of abortions disproportionate to their population density.

The increasing number of abortions subjects physicians to increased dangers of liability for incorrectly interpreting a statute. It appears that doctors face an uncertain fate when performing an abortion. This uncertainty will continue unless the legislatures or courts provide relief from liability. Very few states, if any, will repeal all abortion laws as the Association for the Study of Abortion has recommended. Some states, however, may liberalize their laws in accordance with the A.L.I. suggestion, but we have already seen that in states such as California this is an inadequate remedy in many respects. If the medical profession is to be accorded complete protection, it will have to come through the judicial system.

The Supreme Court of the United States has gone far—some critics contend too far—in permitting individual action in the areas of the Bill of Rights. It has not, however, dealt directly with the problem under discussion, nor do the decided cases cast much light on its solution. The best that we can do is examine related areas and draw some analogies.

In 1922 the Court held that the right "to marry, establish a home and bring up children" was an essential liberty within the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.[32] In 1925 a public school statute requiring attendance exclusively at state schools was declared unconstitutional on the ground that it unreasonably interfered "with the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control."[33] This concept was later extended to include "the private realm of family life which the state cannot enter."[34] And in 1960 the Court declared, in very broad language, that where State action significantly encroached upon personal liberty, its action would be invalid unless the State had a compelling subordinating interest in the particular activity.[35] Finally, in Griswold v. Connecticut[36] the Court struck down the state's statute prohibiting the use of contraceptives. The statute was found to operate upon "an intimate relation of husband and wife" which came within the zone of privacy created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees, the penumbras of which gave protection to the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of his life. The Court determined that the statute was aimed at use rather than regulation and therefore violated the principle that legislation must not be unnecessarily broad. This does not mean that judges are given a free rein to strike down state regulatory statutes. They must look to the collective conscience of our society in determining which rights are fundamental and therefore protected by the Constitution.

The result of these decisions is the evolution of the concept that there is a certain zone of individual privacy which is protected by the Constitution. Unless the State has a compelling subordinating interest that outweighs the individual rights of human beings, it may not interfere with a person's marriage, home, children, and day-to-day living habits. This is one of the most fundamental concepts that the Founding Fathers had in mind when they drafted the Constitution. No one will deny that a State has a valid interest in regulating the well-being of its inhabitants, especially when it is dealing with children, who are more susceptible to undesirable influences. We have also seen that a State may not unreasonably interfere with the intimate relations of its inhabitants. When deciding on the constitutional restraints imposed on a State's interference with individual rights, the vital question becomes one of balancing. It must be determined at what point the State is interfering with individuals and at what point it is exercising valid authority by regulating the well-being of children.

In his concurrence in Griswold, my brother Goldberg asked whether a decree requiring all husbands and wives to be sterilized after the birth of ten children would be valid. He answered the question in the negative.[37] But suppose that the husband and wife voluntarily submitted to sterilization. Would it then violate the Constitution? I think not. Does it therefore follow that voluntary destruction of the fetus is also protected from interference by the State? Perhaps—unless life is present so that the State's compelling subordinating interest in the life of one of its people predominates. However, I submit that until the time that life is present, the State could not interfere with the interruption of pregnancy through abortion performed in a hospital or under appropriate clinical conditions. I say this because State interference is permissible only if reasonably necessary to the effectuation of a legitimate and compelling State interest.[38] Prior to the time that life is present in the fetus, what interest does the State have? Procreation is certainly no longer a legitimate or compelling State interest in these days of burgeoning populations. Moreover, abortion falls within that sensitive area of privacy—the marital relation. One of the basic values of this privacy is birth control, as evidenced by the Griswold decision. Griswold's act was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the Court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed?

The common law courts uniformly held that an infant could not be the subject of a homicide until its complete expulsion from the body of the mother and the establishment of an independent existence.[39] The distinction between fetal life and independent life is that the latter has an independent circulatory system.[40] Hence, where the evidence showed that an infant was killed before its birth was complete or was killed by means used to assist in its delivery, it was not deemed a homicide.[41] Therefore, under the common law, abortion could not be murder. These concepts and distinctions have been somewhat eroded in recent years. At present the courts do not agree on the time when life begins. The courts, however, have held an accoucheur responsible for prenatal brain damage to an infant in a viable state.[42] In this line of cases, the courts have found that the unborn infant was a separate biological entity and hence a legal one in contemplation of law, indicating a departure from the requirement of an independent existence. From this reasoning the courts may well take the unborn child into their protective custody. Indications of such a trend are illustrated by the abolition of the viability rule in some jurisdictions[43] and the repudiation of the "live birth" doctrine by fourteen states.[44]

To say that life is present at conception is to give recognition to the potential, rather than the actual. The unfertilized egg has life, and if fertilized, it takes on human proportions. But the law deals in reality, not obscurity—the known rather than the unknown. When sperm meets egg life may eventually form, but quite often it does not. The law does not deal in speculation. The phenomenon of life takes time to develop, and until it is actually present, it cannot be destroyed. Its interruption prior to formation would hardly be homicide, and as we have seen, society does not regard it as such. The rites of Baptism are not performed and death certificates are not required when a miscarriage occurs.[45] No prosecutor has ever returned a murder indictment charging the taking of the life of a fetus. This would not be the case if the fetus constituted human life.

It has been urged that the courts are the proper forum to determine when life begins. I submit, however, that the professionals are better able to determine when life begins than are the courts. Tort cases might cast some light on the issue,[46] but I would prefer that the courts yield to the expert testimony of doctors. This testimony would vary greatly, but that is nothing new to our judicial system.

This is not a question that will be easily resolved. Few questions that reach the Supreme Court are. As was stated at the Christian Medical Society's Symposium, "professionals . . . do not wish to play God with human lives, whether in being or inchoate with life. But we can inform our judgment . . . by the widest interchange, airing and concensus. Humility is a large part of every professional's code."[47] It must be remembered that many imponderables are a part of Supreme Court adjudications.

Accommodation of conflicting doctrine is more difficult to achieve in the judicial than in the legislative process. Courts cannot reach out to reform our society. A problem comes to the Court in the form of a justiciable issue and is narrowly drawn, rendering the Court's ruling contracted and finespun. Legislatures, on the other hand, have such facilities for investigation as hearings and may address themselves to the necessities of broad social needs and the correction of evils, both probable and existing. As Mr. Justice Cardozo said, "Legislation can eradicate a cancer, right some hoary wrong, correct some definitely established evil, which defies the feebler remedies, the distinctions and the fictions familiar to the judical process."[48]

The courts work on a case-by-case system which deals with the past rather than the future. Society would not have the benefit of the sweeping effect of a statute, nor would the doctor have the protection that he is entitled to receive. The case method would be slow, expensive, and possibly disastrous. It is for the legislature to determine the proper balance, i.e., that point between prevention of conception and viability of the fetus which would give the State the compelling subordinating interest so that it may regulate or prohibit abortion without violating the individual's constitutionally protected rights.

The present climate seems favorable for immediate legislative action. Five states have already led the way.[49] With appropriate action, many more will follow suit in liberalizing their abortion laws. But this process will take less talk and more action. As Nehru once said:

> I am tired of people who merely talk about things. However wise you may be, you can never enter into the spirit of a thing if you only talk about it and do nothing. Even scientists have a tendency to let a wonderful experiment remain an experiment once it has been performed. The next stage somehow does not come. They may well say that the next stage is somebody else's job, but I think if the scientist had a sense of practical application, he would either try to do it himself, or get somebody else to do it. This association of thought with action is, I think, of utmost importance. Thought without action is an abortion; action without thought is folly.[50]

LAW-MEDICINE NOTES

The Right to Health in National and International Law

WILLIAM J. CURRAN, J.D., S.M.Hyg.

THE United States is in the midst of an upheaval of rights. The Supreme Court, which only a few years ago was primarily concerned with the distribution of powers between the federal government and the states, is now a court of civil rights. Throughout the world rising economic expectations are causing peoples to demand more personal and political rights and privileges.

In the World Health Organization, matters of human rights have been a central concern ever since the founding of the agency in 1946. The Preamble to the Constitution of WHO sets forth the basic principle: "The enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health is one of the fundamental rights of every human being without distinction of race, religion, political belief, economic or social condition."

Since 1946, the subject of human rights has received attention in various international meetings and formal protocols, and declarations have recognized certain specific personal rights, the most important being incorporated in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

As a result of the International Conference on Human Rights in Teheran in 1968, the WHO was asked to make studies of the problems of human rights that could be occasioned by recent scientific discoveries and technologic advances. Action was taken by the WHO General Assembly in 1968 and again in 1970 concerning these matters. A preliminary report was prepared by the Secretary-General that collected the history of the subject in international agreements and surveyed the field broadly.[1] Among the newer areas examined in the report are the right of privacy, protection of human personality, experimentation on human subjects, deterioration of the environment, human-rights aspects of the delivery of health services, mental-health problems and nutrition. Nearly all these areas have been explored in these columns in the last few years.

The problem in WHO discussion of these subjects, of course, lies in the fact that nearly all of them are matters of national law rather than international legal powers. WHO and other international bodies can contribute greatly to the resolution of problems in these areas and can propose new formulations, but national action is nearly always required.

In the United States, recent legal developments have provided both greater general recognition of a right to health and direct legal actions concerning specific subjects. In the general area, one of the most important pieces of legislation in Congress has been the Comprehensive Health Planning Act, now in full operation all over the nation on a co-operative, partnership basis among all levels of government. In the declaration of purpose of this legislation it is asserted, "The Congress declares that the fulfillment of our national purpose depends on promoting and assuring the highest level of health attainable for every person, in an environment which contributes positively to healthful individual and family living. . . ."[2]

The bills now before Congress proposing national health insurance and those expanding activities in the field of environmental health all speak in forceful tones about the people's right to health. There are also bills to require studies of the effect of technologic advances on health and human personality.

All physicians and all persons active in the health professions should be aware of the national and international legal activities in this field. These issues will be among the most important to come before the WHO, the UN, and our own national Congress this year.

The rapid change which has taken place in the United States in the past few years in abortion laws and practices is reviewed, with special attention to judicial and legislative developments in America and in other countries. Lessons from the experiences of other countries are cited in terms of their relevance for this country.

ABORTION LAW REFORM AND REPEAL: LEGISLATIVE AND JUDICIAL DEVELOPMENTS

Ruth Roemer, J.D.

IN the three years from 1967 to 1970, a revolution has occurred in the abortion laws and practices in the United States. That revolution is still in process. Our once highly restrictive antiabortion laws have been reformed in 13 states and virtually repealed in four states. No other country has a statute which explicitly makes abortion a matter for decision by the woman and her physician. Although other countries permit abortion on request of the woman under certain circumstances, the four American states have pioneered in treating abortion, as a matter of law, like any other medical procedure.

As a result of recent developments, the United States has become a laboratory in which three different types of legal regulation of abortion can be compared and evaluated. We can also profit from the longer experience of other countries with abortion statutes of varying liberality, although account must be taken of differing family planning programs and systems of delivering health services.

Legislative Developments in the United States

Three kinds of modernized abortion laws have been enacted in the United States since 1967: (1) Twelve states have enacted all or part of the Model Penal Code first proposed in 1957 by the American Law Institute (ALI), under which abortion is not a crime when performed by a licensed physician because of substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the woman or that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or in cases of pregnancy resulting from rape or incest.[1] (2) One state, Oregon, has expanded the American Law Institute grounds to include a sociomedical ground proposed originally by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists[2] and patterned after a provision of the British Abortion Act of 1967,[3] i.e., that in determining whether or not there is substantial risk to the woman's physical or mental health, account may be taken of her total environment, actual or reasonably foreseeable.[4] (3) Four states—Alaska,[5] Hawaii,[6] New York[7] and the State of Washington (by referendum in November 1970)—have repealed all criminal penalties for abortion, provided only that the abortion is done early in pregnancy and by a licensed physician (Alaska, Hawaii, and Washington also stipulate that the operation must take place in a licensed hospital or other approved facility). Thirty-three states, however, still have laws making abortion a crime except when performed to save the life (or, in a few instances, the health) of the woman. None of these states even requires that the abortion be performed by a licensed physician.

The details of the new laws vary in their provisions.* The key developments relate to six general aspects:

1. All 17 states require that the abortion be performed by a licensed physician.

2. All the states with new laws, except Mississippi and New York, require that the abortion be performed in hospitals, with Kansas also permitting another place designated by law.[8] New York City has recently added the requirement that abortions be performed in hospitals or clinics, and not in doctors' offices.

3. All 17 states allow abortion to save the life of the woman, and also in pregnancies resulting from sex crimes.

All these 17 states (except Mississippi, which authorizes abortion only for rape or to save life) allow abortion to preserve the health or the physical or mental health of the woman. The sociomedical standard of the Oregon law mentioned above is a broader standard than the medical standard of the ALI-style laws.

Seven states set age limits on abortions for statutory rape. These limits may be lower than the age of consent. Thus, in California sexual intercourse with an unmarried girl below the age of 18 constitutes statutory rape; but if pregnancy results, it can be terminated only if the girl is below the age of 15.

All 17 states, except California and Mississippi, allow abortion for fetal abnormality.

4. The maximum time limits within which abortions may be performed vary from 16 weeks in Colorado, New Mexico, and Washington to 26 weeks in Maryland. In Oregon the time limit is 150 days; in Alaska and Hawaii, the fetus must be nonviable; and in New York the time limit is 24 weeks.

5. Medical approval by consultants, boards, or hospital therapeutic abortion committees is required in all states (except Mississippi) with ALI-style laws, although the Model Penal Code did not propose such procedures. In Oregon, two physicians must certify the circumstances justifying an abortion; in Alaska, Hawaii, and New York, only one physician is required.

6. New York and the following ALI-style states have no residency requirement: California, Colorado, Kansas, Maryland, Mississippi, and New Mexico. South Carolina, Hawaii, and the State of Washington have a 90-day residency requirement, and Arkansas, Delaware, North Carolina, and Virginia require four months' residency. Oregon requires that the patient be a resident, and Alaska requires 30 days' residency.

Actual practice, of course, may differ from the provisions of the statutes. In some places, doctors will not perform abortions as late as the statute allows. Nonresidents may not be welcomed even though the state has no residency requirement. Consents, consultations, and committee approvals may be required that are not specified in the statutes. It is also possible that residency requirements may not be strictly enforced and procedures may be more simple than those provided in the statute.

On the federal level, a bill introduced in Congress by Senator Packwood to legalize abortion throughout the nation made no progress. A recent policy enunciated for U.S. military hospitals, how-

* The provisions of all the abortion laws in the United States are summarized in a table, "Current Status of Abortion Laws—August 1, 1970," available upon request from the National Center for Family Planning Services, Health Services and Mental Health Administration, U. ever, permits abortions and sterilizations for military personnel, active or retired, and their families, regardless of state or local laws.[9] In October, 1970, a White House task force on the mentally handicapped recommended that, in the interest of both maternal and child mental health, no woman should be forced to bear an unwanted child.

Judicial Developments in the United States

Legislative developments have been accompanied by an emerging body of court decisions on the constitutionality of antiabortion laws. The picture changes almost from day to day. As of autumn, 1970, five cases were on the U.S. Supreme Court docket, more than 20 cases were before three-judge federal courts; and, excluding the 20 states with federal cases, many of which also had state cases, another 11 states had cases pending in local courts.[10] The following important cases may be noted.

1. In September, 1969, the Supreme Court of California, in the first decision on the constitutionality of any antiabortion statute, invalidated the pre-1967 antiabortion law of California. In a four to three decision in People v. Belous,[11] the court held the statute unconstitutional on two principal grounds: (1) that the phrase, "necessary to preserve life," was so vague as to be violative of the due process requirements for a criminal law, and (2) that the law was in violation of a woman's fundamental rights to life and to choose whether to bear children. The latter follows from the U.S. Supreme Court's acknowledgment of a right of privacy or liberty in matters related to marriage, family, and sex.[12]

The critical issue defined by the California Supreme Court was whether the state had any legitimate interest in the regulation of abortion which would justify so deep an infringement of the fundamental rights of women. The court held that the state had no such compelling interest. The court said that it would not speak to the constitutionality of the current California Therapeutic Abortion Act, since Dr. Belous was charged under the old law. But one might well infer from the decision that the current law may be declared unconstitutional on similar grounds. The court did express the view, however, that the decision to terminate pregnancy under the 1967 Therapeutic Abortion Act was solely a medical one, and so long as the physician follows the procedural requirements of the act his judgment may not later be challenged by a jury or prosecutor in a criminal case.

2. Following the landmark decision of the California Supreme Court, the first decision of a federal court invalidating an antiabortion statute was handed down. In U.S. v. Vuitch,[13] the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia held unconstitutional the District of Columbia statute which made abortion a felony unless performed by a licensed physician for the preservation of the mother's life or health. The court held this phrase so uncertain and ambiguous as to invalidate the statute for want of due process, and it recommended appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. The opinion of Judge Gerhard A. Gesell in Vuitch emphasized, as the Belous decision had done, the woman's liberty and right of privacy in matters related to family, marriage, and sex and the necessity for demonstrating affirmatively the interest of the state in infringing on such rights. The opinion pointed out the discriminatory application of the statute with respect to women who are poor. This case is now on appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has raised certain jurisdictional questions concerning the propriety of direct appeal to the Supreme Court without first proceeding to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

3. In addition to these two decisions which broke new legal ground, a number of other courts have invalidated pre-

ALI-style antiabortion laws. These cases have arisen in both federal and state courts.

Three-judge panels of federal district courts have held the pre-ALI-style laws of Texas[14] and Wisconsin[15] unconstitutional because of overbreadth. One court also held the statute void for vagueness, and both courts found the statutes an unconstitutional invasion of private rights and not justified by a compelling interest of the state. Contrary is one federal court which, in a two to one decision, upheld the antiabortion statute of Louisiana.[16]

Similar suits have been brought in federal courts involving the Arizona,[17] Illinois,[18] and New Jersey laws.[19] Suits challenging the Kentucky[20] and Minnesota[21] laws were dismissed on jurisdictional grounds, and the New York case was dismissed as moot on repeal of New York's antiabortion statute.[22]

State courts have also struck down pre-ALI-style laws. In Illinois, a judge of the criminal court held the abortion statute unconstitutional on grounds of vagueness and infringement on the woman's right to control her body.[23] In Pennsylvania, a county court judge found that that state's statute impinges on constitutionally protected areas and is so broad, unlimited, and indiscriminate that it fails to meet present-day tests for constitutionality.[24] In South Dakota, a circuit court condemned the statute because it interferes with private conduct without serving any vital interest of society.[25] In Michigan, the statute was found defective as infringing on the right of privacy in the physician-patient relationship and as possibly violative of the patient's right to safe and adequate medical treatment.[26] Contra, however, is the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, which upheld the constitutionality of the state's statute prohibiting "unlawful" abortion against a charge of vagueness in a case sustaining revocation of a medical license.[27] Suits challenging other pre-ALI-style laws are still pending elsewhere.[28]

4. Attempts are currently being made to obtain an adjudication of the constitutionality of reformed ALI-style laws.[29] Thus far, only one reformed ALI-style law has been invalidated by a federal court—Georgia's 1968 abortion law. The U.S. District Court in Atlanta held unconstitutional those parts of the 1968 Georgia law that limited the woman's right to abortion to the three ALI grounds.[30] The basis of the court's decision was violation of the woman's right of privacy. Retained as a proper exercise of state power, however, were the requirements for medical consultation, hospital committee approval, hospital accreditation and exemption provisions, and the residency requirement.

On the state level, the California Therapeutic Abortion Act has been challenged in three cases. Two cases involving Doctors Robb and Gwynne are still pending, but preliminary decisions involving these doctors have held the California statute unconstitutional.[31] In People v. Barksdale, a municipal court in Alameda County held the current California law unconstitutional as violative of the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment, as a vague and improper delegation of legislative authority to the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, as discriminatory between the rich and the poor, as lacking the certainty required for a criminal statute with respect to the definition of mental illness, and as violative of the fundamental right of the woman to make a free choice whether or not to bear children.[32] In rejecting the argument that the state has a compelling interest in protecting the embryo, Judge T. L. Foley added the following poignant words:

> I might say that I belong to the religion that was just referred to, and I dislike to render this opinion. I must follow the law under my oath as a Judge. I am a Catholic which makes it very, very difficult—but my oath of office calls for me to follow the law as stated and set out by the Appellate Courts of this State.[33]

The judicial picture is in constant flux as new cases are filed in federal and state courts; as the defense of unconstitutionality is raised in criminal prosecutions of doctors; as issues are raised concerning jurisdiction of courts and standing of plaintiffs to sue; and as decisions come down and appeals are taken.

On at least eight occasions, the United States Supreme Court has declined to review state court decisions that involved restrictive antiabortion laws.[34] One of these cases was the landmark decision of the California Supreme Court in Belous. On October 13, 1970, the court dismissed an appeal from the decision of a three-judge federal court holding the Wisconsin antiabortion statute unconstitutional.[35] Action by the court on the merits of abortion cases will be decisive, but it is possible that some of the cases will go off on questions of jurisdiction or on grounds other than the basic constitutional issues.

Although the final outcome cannot be predicted, three eventualities seem fairly certain. First, more and more states will change their laws in accordance with one or another of the three patterns now prevailing in the United States. Second, as in other nations of the world, moderately reformed laws will be amended to expand the grounds and to simplify the procedures; alternatively, antiabortion laws will be repealed. Third, in every state pressure will mount for making abortion available de facto as well as de jure to women, rich and poor, faced with the despair and desperation occasioned by unwanted pregnancy.

Recent Developments in Other Countries

The abortion laws of the world have been described on a five-stage continuum, ranging from the most permissive to the most restrictive.[36] Recent legislative changes show that more and more countries are liberalizing their laws or the interpretation of their laws all along this continuum.

1. Abortion on the Insistence of the Woman—No new jurisdictions have joined this category, except the four states in the United States discussed previously. The tightening of the Bulgarian law in 1968[37] in order to encourage population growth has been eased by a 1970 interpretation that allows abortion virtually on request for unmarried women and women having at least one child.[38] The hope is that this interpretation will reduce the number of illegal abortions. In these cases, the Bulgarian law resembles once again the most liberal laws of the USSR and Hungary. Now that the German Democratic Republic has liberalized its policy on abortion, as mentioned below, the only restrictive abortion statutes remaining in eastern Europe are those of Romania and Albania.

2. Abortion on Social Grounds—Two Scandinavian countries, Finland and Denmark, have liberalized their statutes further to include social grounds. The 1970 law in Finland specifies, in addition to medical and humanitarian reasons and the age of the mother (under 17 or over 40 or already the mother of four children), the following social ground:

> . . . when the delivery and care of the child would constitute, by reason of the conditions of existence of the woman and her family, as well as other circumstances, a change for her.[39]

A unique provision, relevant for all countries faced with expanding demand for abortions, requires the Finnish Department of Health to assure a sufficient number of qualified physicians and abortion hospitals and also impartial and uniform conduct from physicians.

The Danish law of 1970 permits abortion without authorization of a committee for reasons of life or health or in cases where the woman is over 38 or has four children under age 18 who reside with her.[46] Authorization of a committee is required if the abortion is sought for sociomedical reasons, danger of fetal abnormality, or pregnancy resulting from a sex crime.

Sweden has not yet announced changes in its abortion law which have been under consideration for three years. Various alternatives are bruited about; that abortion may be permitted on the free choice of the woman provided she consults fully with an abortion service or, possibly, that the decision-making process may be decentralized in order to reduce the current delay which drives many women to illegal abortion.

3. Abortion on Sociomedical Grounds—Singapore has enacted sociomedical grounds for abortion along the lines of the British Abortion Act of 1967 but with approval required by a Termination of Pregnancy Authorisation Board, except when abortion is to preserve life or health.[41] This is the first Asian country, after Japan, to enact a liberalized abortion law.

The state of South Australia has also enacted an abortion lay modeled after the new British law.[42] Similar legislation is under discussion in New South Wales. A poll of general practitioners in Sydney, N.S.W., found that 957 women approached 92 general practitioners with requests for help in obtaining an abortion in a single year.[43] The fact that each general practitioner is confronted with a major dilemma of this kind ten times a year explains the high proportion of general practitioners in Sydney (76%) who favor liberalization of the law.

Since 1965, the German Democratic Republic has liberalized interpretation of its law, so that abortion is now authorized on sociomedical grounds.[44]

Legislation is still pending in India, which in the form proposed would allow abortion on sociomedical grounds and in cases of contraceptive failure.[45]

Experience in England, Wales, and Scotland during the first 18 months of the operation of the 1967 British abortion law reveals a shift from illegal to legal abortion, a shift from the private sector to the National Health Service, a slowing down of the illegitimacy rate (47% of all abortions in the first 18 months were for single women), and a narrowing of regional discrepancies in the operation of the law.[46] With the aid of voluntary pregnancy advisory services, abortion is being made available to women in all geographic areas and income groups.[47] Attitudes of gynecologists are becoming more sympathetic to applicants for abortion, as reflected by "the granting of National Health Service abortions on an increasing scale and by bodies such as the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists taking a sincere, if belated, interest in contraception and sterilisation."[48] The most serious problem appears to be the universal need for improving contraceptive services and practices.

4. Abortion on Medical Grounds—Canada[49] and Peru[50] have broadened their abortion laws to permit abortion on the grounds of danger to the life or health of the woman.

5. Abortion Only to Save the Life of the Woman—This category has lost adherents. It will continue to do so as current law reform activities in many countries, e.g., France, increase in tempo.

Insights from Abroad

As the United States moves into the problems associated with providing medical care under its new abortion laws, several lessons from the experience of other nations seem relevant.

1. A liberal abortion law will transfer a number of illegal abortions to safe, clinical practice; but as long as restrictions in grounds or procedures remain, some illegal abortion will persist.[51] Initial experience under the California Therapeutic Abortion Act confirms this finding.[52] Therefore, experience in the four states that have removed virtually all restrictions will be extremely important.

2. The earlier in pregnancy that abortion is provided, the less tendency there is to resort to illegal abortion. In eastern Europe, where abortion is generally done early in pregnancy, illegal abortion has been almost eliminated. The reverse is true in Sweden, where administrative procedures delay authorization for legal abortion. The U.S. laws specify time periods within which the abortion must be performed, but, in addition, women should be educated to seek abortions early and procedures should be simplified to achieve this objective.

3. On the basis of experience from eastern Europe, mortality from legal abortion can be anticipated to be low, particularly if performed early in pregnancy.[53] Complications in eastern Europe affect less than 3 per cent of patients.[54] England, as yet, has insufficient data on morbidity. One British authority has suggested that the requirement of a medical report within seven days after the abortion is too short a time to provide accurate information on complications.[55] Accurate records and reporting are essential.

4. As the British experience indicates, the climbing rate of illegitimacy in the United States may be slowed by increased availability of abortion. With nearly 10 per cent of all U.S. births in 1967 illegitimate, the option of abortion will need to be made widely known and accessible if the risks to health and the social disabilities of births to unmarried mothers are to be lessened.[56]

5. Uneven application of the law by reason of varying attitudes on the part of physicians can be anticipated from the experience in England and Norway. California's experience is similar. Continuing education programs for the medical profession and reforms in medical education are urgent.

6. Shortages of medical and auxiliary personnel may impede full implementation of new laws. In England, however, it was found that, if evenly distributed among all gynecologists, the increased number of abortions would not constitute an excessive workload.[57] It has been suggested that in the United States the load might be distributed among a larger group of physicians than those specialized in gynecology, if the social policy expressed by the new laws is to be implemented. Residents and interns on all services might be expected to perform abortions. Nurse-midwives might also be trained and utilized to perform early abortions. Such a decision would require amendment of the licensure laws in the three states that now license nurse-midwives and enactment of such licensure laws in other states.

7. England's experience shows the bottleneck that may result from shortage of facilities. Ambulatory care, as provided in other countries and as now demonstrated in the United States, is a promising solution for early abortions. Moreover, ambulatory treatment reduces the cost of abortions.

8. Evidence from Chile, South Korea, and Taiwan indicates that, in a country with a high or increasing abortion rate, the conditions are favorable for effective family planning programs.[58] A possible hazard is that the easy solution of abortion may generate a lack of responsibility in using contraceptives. Zeal to meet a long-neglected human need should be accompanied by efforts to use abortion as a means of encouraging effective contraception. A number of European statutes prohibit abortion if an abortion has been performed in the preceding six-month period. A more effective deterrent to repeated abortion would consist in aiding every woman who has an abortion to obtain and use effective methods of contraception.

The dynamic legislative and judicial developments in the laws governing abortion in the Untied States have generated a ground swell of change. The action of the U.S. Supreme Court is crucial to the rate of progress, but, regardless of the outcome of cases pending before the court, the clock can never be turned back. Safe, legal abortion is now recognized as a fundamental right of women, a protection of maternal health and family welfare, and an assurance that every child is a loved and wanted child. Abortion, however, should be only one service in an array of services that should also include effective contraception, education for responsible sexual relationships, and health protection for mothers and children.

MEDICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE STUDIES ON ABORTION PRACTICES

Item No. 42

The "Perfect Contraceptive" Population

The extent and implications of unwanted fertility in the United States are considered.

Larry Bumpass and Charles F. Westoff

Recent discussions of population policy have raised and sharpened the question of unwanted fertility in the United States (1). The issue is whether the elimination of unwanted fertility would have a significant effect on our rate of population growth, and the discussion has revolved in part around what might be called the demographic implications of "perfect contraception." We are not suggesting that such a technological development is in sight, or that, if it were, we would not have to be concerned about problems of distribution and use. The "perfect contraceptive" population is simply a model in which couples can avoid having more children than they want and do not have children before they want them. In the broader sense we are visualizing the "complete fertility controlling population" rather than the "perfectly contraceptive population." The achievement of such a state of affairs might well require social policies for the development of more effective contraceptive techniques and more efficient distribution systems as well as the legalization of abortion on request. However, this article is focused on implications of the elimination of unwanted fertility rather than on specific policies necessary to realize this goal.

We make no artificial assumptions about fecundity; we assume that the current incidence of subfecundity (less than normal capacity to reproduce) in the United States will continue. Also, we are not assuming that every couple will practice contraception or that all couples will begin using contraception at the same stage of their marriage. The system is completely voluntary. The only condition we are imposing is that couples can control their fertility completely in the sense that they can, within the limits of physiological capacity and variability, have the number of children they want, when they want them. If a husband and wife prefer to have children right away or want a large family, they may use no contraception at all. On the other hand, if they wish to control their fertility (a virtually universal wish in the sense that practically all exposed couples in the United States use contraception sooner or later) (2), they shall be able to practice completely effective and completely acceptable contraception continuously. "Completely effective" means that the failure rate is zero; "completely acceptable" means that the use of contraception carries no costs of any kind—economic, social, or psychological—and that its use would be interrupted only for the purpose of conceiving. While such conditions are Utopian, the model provides a useful framework for assessing the implications of current levels of unwanted fertility in the United States for the rate of population growth.

Radically different policy implications flow from (i) the position that achieving a zero or near-zero rate of population growth requires changing the number of children couples want, and (ii) the position that eliminating unwanted births is sufficient. Consequently, it is important that we evaluate the number of unwanted births in the United States on the basis of the most recent detailed data available. Our estimates are based on the 1965 National Fertility Study (NFS), an interview survey of a probability sample of 5600 married women throughout the nation (3).

Measurement of Unwanted Fertility

Reliable reports on unwanted births are difficult to obtain, since the admission that a birth was unwanted reflects on the respondent's ability to control fertility and perhaps also on the status of the child. Unwanted fertility was measured in the 1965 NFS on the basis of questions about the circumstances of each pregnancy. Women who reported the use of some contraceptive method preceding a pregnancy were asked, "Under which of these circumstances did this pregnancy occur?" A card listing the following categories was shown to the respondent:

1) While using a method and did not want to become pregnant at that time.
2) While not using a method but did not want to become pregnant at that time.
3) When stopped using a method in order to have a child.

Women who reported circumstances 1 or 2 were then asked, "Before you became pregnant this time, did you want to have a child (or another child) sometime?" and "Did your husband want to have a child (or another child) sometime?"

Women who reported not having practiced contraception prior to pregnancy were asked: "Was the only reason you did not use any method then because you wanted to have a baby as soon as possible?" Those who answered "No" were asked the same questions as the other group about whether they had wanted another child sometime.

Since couples are not always in agreement on the desirability of having additional children, alternative definitions of "unwanted" fertility are possible. A minimal definition would require that both spouses had been reported not to have wanted another child before pregnancy occurred. A broader definition would require only that one spouse had been reported not to have wanted an additional child. When husband and wife disagree on this question, some couples will intentionally have another child, others will not. It seems reasonable to assume that the proportion of unwanted births lies somewhere between estimates resulting from these two definitions, and that the average of the two constitutes a best estimate. We use this estimate throughout the text, although the consequences of alternative definitions are reported in several tables for the reader's evaluation.

To what extent are these measures of unwanted fertility reliable and valid? As part of the 1965 NFS, a subsample of the original sample of women was re-interviewed 3 to 5 months later, to assess the reliability of survey data on fertility and family planning. The percentage of births classified as unwanted differs by 0.3 percent in the two interviews. Checks for internal consistency reveal that none of the women who reported that their last child was unwanted replied (to a different question) that they intended to have additional children. In addition, the NFS estimate is consistent with reports of other fertility surveys based on differing measurement techniques (4).

An indirect check on the validity of our estimates can be made in terms of contraceptive efficacy. When we consider women who are near the end of the childbearing stage (40 to 44 years of age), the percentage classified as having experienced at least one unwanted birth implies, even when allowance is made for underreporting, an average contraceptive efficacy that is improbably high (5). Realistic assumptions about the level of contraceptive efficacy of this population would very likely lead to a figure for the proportion who had experienced at least one unwanted birth that is higher than the estimate obtained by the measures used here (6). This is independent evidence that there is considerable rationalization in the report of unwanted births and that our estimates of unwanted fertility are not likely to be too high.

Incidence and Characteristics of Unwanted Fertility

In order to focus on the most recent picture for which data are available, we have limited the analysis in this section to births which occurred between the beginning of 1960 and the time of interview, the autumn of 1965.

It is evident from the data of Table 1 that unwanted births comprised a substantial proportion of total births during these years. Our estimates indicate that one-fifth of all births and more than one-third of Negro births between 1960 and 1965 were unwanted. As one would expect, the proportion of unwanted births increases rapidly with birth order. Almost one-third of all fourth-order births and one-half of all sixth- or higher-order births were unwanted; for Negroes the corresponding proportions are nearly one-half and two-thirds. This high level of unwanted births among Negroes indicates the magnitude of the burden of unwanted dependents that is borne by this population, but the problems of unwanted births are substantial among whites as well.

The incidence of unwanted births is negatively related to both education and income (Tables 2 and 3). In general, the proportion of unwanted births is approximately twice as high among wives with less than a high school education as among wives who have attended college. By income, the proportion of births reported as unwanted varies little for families whose 1964 income was over $5000, but it is more than twice as high for families with incomes of less than $3000 as for those with incomes of over $10,000. This differential is particularly marked among Negroes.

We have approximated the Social Security Administration's definition of poverty (7), and the results are presented in Table 4. Since family size is one component of that definition, many couples would not have been classified as poor were it not for their having had unwanted children. Consequently, the results indicate the coincidence of poverty and unwanted births rather than a propensity of the "poor" to have unwanted children. Among the "poor" in 1965, unwanted births constituted almost two-fifths of all births and three-fifths of all sixth- and higher-order births; among the "non-poor" one out of every seven births was unwanted among whites and one out of every five among Negroes (8).

Estimates for All Women

The foregoing analysis is based on a sample of married women living with their husbands in 1965; consequently, births to women not living with their husbands and most illegitimate births are not represented (9). In the absence of reliable data on the subject, our procedures are based on the assumption that the incidence and birth-order distribution of unwanted births are the same for such births as for births reported by wives now living with their husbands. This undoubtedly is a bias in the direction of underestimating the extent of unwanted fertility.

We prepared our estimates separately by race and birth order and then summed them to obtain the total. We estimate that in the period 1960 to 1965 there were 4.7 million births that would have been prevented by "perfect contraception." These births represent one-fifth of all births during the period. Approximately 2 million of these unwanted births occurred among the poor and the near-poor, and half of these among the Negro poor and near-poor (Table 5).

Timing Failures

While the level of unwanted births is high, the data of Table 6 make it clear that many desired births are timing failures. A birth was classified as a timing failure when it was reported as wanted but not the result of the deliberate interruption of contraception.

Of wanted births occurring between 1960 and 1965, two-fifths would have occurred later if their timing had been controlled. The short-run demographic effects of the prevention of timing failures depend upon the length of time considered and the assumed time required for the transition to perfect contraception (contraception enabling every couple to avoid failures in regulating family size and in timing births). For example, if perfect contraception had been universally employed at the beginning of 1960, perhaps 7 percent of the wanted births that occurred between 1960 and 1965 would have been delayed until after 1965. This estimate is based on the assumption that the average length of a successfully planned interval is 1 year longer than that of an interval in which timing was not controlled. If births are delayed, total fertility for each cohort (women born in the same year) being kept constant, there is a dip in births while the change occurs and no subsequent "makeup" of the lost births until the mean age of childbearing falls. When the transition is complete, a certain number of births will have been deferred to subsequent years, and this number will remain fixed so long as the new spacing pattern persists.

After the transitory dip is over, the number of births may be affected by increased spacing (total fertility for each cohort being kept constant) because fertility is centered on a lower portion of the stable age distribution. This effect is negligible in a low-mortality population reproducing at a rate near replacement.

There is, however, one possible indirect consequence of such timing changes that has potential long-run significance. It has been suggested that the longer a birth is delayed, the less likely a woman is to have that birth or a subsequent birth (10). The longer a couple puts off having a "wanted" child, the more opportunity the wife has to acquire role patterns at variance with early child-care responsibility. At some point that birth, or a desired subsequent birth, may no longer seem so desirable. In addition, the delay of a desired birth increases the possibility that the birth will be prevented by subfecundity. In any event, the major demographic effect of the universal use of contraception would be the prevention of unwanted births. In the next section we will discuss the long-run implications of this effect.

Long-Run Implications for U.S. Growth Rate

Since nearly 20 percent of all recent births were unwanted, the elimination of unwanted births could substantially reduce our future growth rate. However, the size of this reduction would depend upon the number of children that women now entering the childbearing years will ultimately want to have.

Viewed from a cohort perspective, for women who were near the end of their childbearing years in 1965 (ages 35 to 44), the elimination of births reported to have been unwanted would have reduced their fertility from 3.0 to 2.5 births per woman. Since an eventual zero rate of population growth would require cohort fertility of about 2.25 births per woman, the elimination of unwanted births would not have been sufficient to establish exact replacement for this cohort, but it would have resulted in considerable progress toward that objective. The proportion of unwanted births (16 percent) reported by this cohort—the figure used to calculate the above estimate of 2.5 births—is lower than the proportion reported for all women in the period 1960–1965, probably due to additional underreporting of unwanted births resulting from the longer period of time that had elapsed since the events in question in the case of the women aged 35 to 44. The demographic effect of eliminating unwanted births is probably greater than we infer because of this underreporting by older women and the probable underreporting of unwanted births in general, and also because the additional children born to these older women before they reach menopause will undoubtedly be mostly unwanted.

The above estimate is based on the experience of married women whose childbearing took place in the high fertility period of the early 1950's. Under circumstances of perfect contraception, women now entering the childbearing years might decide to have larger families than women who have preceded them would have had if they had complete control of fertility, but this does not seem likely. Rapid diffusion of use of the pill has continued since 1965, and one of the consequences of this diffusion may be reduction of the number of "desired" as well as of unwanted children. As women are able increasingly to postpone pregnancy and to enter into nonfamilial roles (particularly employment), many may prefer to have aller families than they would otherse have chosen. If, in addition, there a trend toward nonfamilial female les, there may be strong pressures ainst any upsurge in the average mily size that would be achieved by merican women with complete fertility ntrol.

In fact there are already indications hat the ultimate family size of the most ecent cohorts may be lower than that f preceding cohorts (11). This decline ay be the result of some reduction in nwanted births, in some reduction in he number of children women want to ave, or in some combination of these factors. Predicting the fertility of young women is always precarious, but it eems likely to us that, under the assumption of perfect contraception, the ultimate number of children today's young women would bear would be below the number inferred, under the same assumption, for women who were between the ages of 35 and 44 in 1965. There is some evidence from longitudinal studies that success in the control of fertility results in smaller families than were originally desired (12).

However, it is very important that we keep in mind the legacy of past fertility when considering the potential implications, for the U.S. growth rate, of the elimination of unwanted births. Even if exact cohort replacement could be achieved, the population would not immediately cease to grow. The time required for cohort fertility to reach the replacement rate would depend upon the speed with which universal perfect contraception was achieved. After the replacement rate had been attained, it would be some time before the effects of past fertility on the age structure would level off. Frejka has prepared estimates directly relevant to this question (13). He demonstrates that if the cohort comprised of women entering their childbearing years between 1965 and 1970 and all subsequent cohorts were to achieve a cohort fertility of exact replacement, the population would continue to grow at least until the year 2035, with a resultant increase in size of 40 to 50 percent.

In summary, the elimination of unwanted births would lead to a reduced growth rate for the United States, barring a marked increase in the average number of children desired. However, even if cohort replacement were achieved (perhaps as a consequence of other developments as well), a zero growth rate for the United States could not be achieved for over 60 years, by which time the population would number over 280 million. The longer it takes to achieve universal perfect contraception, the longer it will take to reduce our growth rate, and the larger, of course, will be the eventual size of our population.

In terms of the implications for a population policy goal of zero growth, our findings do not imply that the task of influencing people to want fewer children should be ignored, especially since this number could shift upward again. However, the elimination of unwanted births would have considerable demographic effect, it would be desirable in human terms, and it would probably be a more readily attainable objective.

Appendix: Comparison with Other Measures

Since the conclusions reached by the use of more conventional measures of "desired" or "ideal" family size (14) differ radically from those reached by our procedure of inferring the desired number of children, a word on the differences in the two approaches is necessary. The first is used typically in surveys with married women of all ages within the reproductive span and with varying numbers of children; in this approach the woman is simply asked how many children she would like to have or how many she would consider ideal for herself, or, in some instances, for the average American family. Our approach has been to infer the desired number of children by subtracting the number of unwanted births from the total number of births. The latter procedure results in considerably lower estimates of the number desired. For example, married women aged 35 to 44 in 1965 reported, through the direct approach, a "desired family size" of 3.4 children, as compared with 2.5 children as estimated by our procedure.

In general, the difference is probably attributable to real differences reflected by the two types of measurement. In the direct approach, desired family size relates to the time of the survey and is based on the respondent's fertility history and on her and her husband's adjustment to it. It is not at all inconsistent for a couple that has had a child that had been unwanted to state later, on the basis of a satisfactory (even beneficial) adjustment to the unwanted birth, that the size of their family is what they desire. To infer that this is the number of children such couples would have wanted under the conditions of perfect fertility control would be erroneous. For couples early in their life cycle, the measure of "desired family size" may be highly invalid as a predictor of the number of children they would have if they could control their fertility. The average family size desired by young couples corresponds closely with the eventual average family size for these couples, regardless of the number of unwanted births; this suggests that the number of children young couples desire before the experience of childrearing may be largely a reflection of the observed sizes of the families of other couples of similar social status.

On the other hand, when desired family size is measured by subtracting (for women past the childbearing years) the number of unwanted births from the number of children borne, the time focus is on evaluation of the event at the time of pregnancy. Although the responses may still be influenced by intervening experience, this bias should be much less than the bias when the reference is to the present, or to the future conditioned by the present.

The two types of variables can be measured independently, since about half of the women who reported an unwanted birth also said they would not have preferred to have fewer children than they had. Both measures are useful, but it seems to us that the approach we have defined in this article is the more suited to the task of assessing the demographic implications of perfect contraception.

GEOGRAPHIC DISTRIBUTION OF NEED FOR FAMILY PLANNING AND SUBSIDIZED SERVICES IN THE UNITED STATES

Raymond C. Lerner, Ph.D.

Introduction

A STUDY, Need for Subsidized Family Planning Services: United States, Each State and County, 1968, has recently been released by the Family Planning Office of the Office of Economic Opportunity. This paper will review the purpose and design of the study, and discuss findings which relate to the distribution of women at risk, the number reported served in subsidized programs, and the number unserved, by county, for the United States.

The object of this work was to collect, for each of the 3,072 counties in the U. S., basic data on the need for subsidized family planning services, the services currently available, selected characteristics relevant to need, and resources available for the delivery of services.

The purpose in compiling and collecting such data was, for the first time, to develop a capability for estimating the level of organized family planning services in the U. S. In addition, such information could assist in planning by making it possible to examine where program inputs were going and where they were needed. A file of this nature, it was felt, would also provide baseline data useful for monitoring improvements in the distribution of program efforts over time, and might also serve as a preliminary tool for evaluating the effectiveness of publicly financed family planning programs in reaching program objectives.

For each county in the U. S., selected variables on needs and resources have been compiled from existing sources; however, data on services required field surveys. This paper will deal with only a limited portion of the material on file; the items included in the study for each county are listed in the Appendix.

Methodology

The report, *Need for Subsidized Family Planning Services: United States, Each State and County, 1968, includes a full discussion of the methodology and the limitations of data. However, a few important points relevant to the material in this paper will be discussed here.

Population

The basic population denominator and number of women age 15-44 in this work consist of 1966 population estimates for the United States, by county, made by the State and Local Population Estimates Branch, Population Division, U S. Bureau of the Census.*

Need

The total number of women age 15-44 estimated to require subsidized family planning services consist of those who can be classified as medically indigent, fertile, exposed to risk of pregnancy, not currently pregnant or seeking a desired pregnancy. This has been approximated by applying the Dryfoos-Polgar-Varky formula to the census estimates for each county for 1966. The methodology employed by the formula, which was developed at Planned Parenthood, is described in detail in the full report.

Current Services

Because there were no readily available nationwide statistics giving patient figures from which to determine how many women were currently receiving family planning service from organized programs during the period from July 1, 1967, to June 30, 1968, three mail surveys had to be conducted.

We know that health departments, hospitals, and free-standing clinics are the major channels through which subsidized family planning services are delivered, but knowledge of the level of service and the exact locations of service facilities is severely limited. In order to establish a preliminary universe of agencies providing organized family planning services to low-income women, available data from previous reports and surveys were examined for each of these three channels. The field to be surveyed included voluntary and public hospitals, health departments, Planned Parenthood clinics, OEO family planning projects, Neighborhood Health Centers, maternity and infant care projects, and other agencies known to be providing family planning.

It was decided to survey hospitals, Planned Parenthood affiliates, and state health departments—individually and directly—to determine the number of patients served in their programs, and the addresses of their clinics. Responses originating from the same locality were compared for duplications, since combined funding and sponsorship sometimes result in duplicate reporting. When necessary, responses were also edited for conversion from visits to persons served since some agencies do not have record systems which enable them to report unduplicated counts of patients served. While the service figures are probably the best available nationally, they must be regarded as approximations.

No attempt was made to obtain figures on the number of women in the target population served by private physicians at their own expense or through Medicaid. Estimates based on scanty data place this proportion at less than 10 per cent of those in need. Nor could a study of this kind attempt to assess the retention rate of service programs or to evaluate their general quality. Therefore, while the term "number of women served" is employed, it would be more accurate to refer to the "number of patients enrolled" by an organized family planning service. How well or how fully the patients are served is not known, and it is probable that great variation exists from program to program. The study, therefore, could be regarded as estimating the extent to which organized programs have been successful in at least enrolling the population in need—a necessary first step toward the systematic evaluation of any program.

Within the defined universe of programs and agencies from which service data were sought, the response rate was excellent, nearly 100 per cent in all categories.

Findings

The data to be presented now are limited to distributions of need and services by county, along with a preliminary assessment of some general characteristics of the counties containing and not containing organized services.

Table 1 provides a summary of the distribution of U. S. counties by the number reporting organized family planning services in fiscal 1968.

In the U. S., it is estimated that, in FY 1968, there were approximately 5.4 million medically indigent women in need of subsidized family planning services. Among the 3,072 U. S. counties, only 1,200 reported organized programs, while, in 1,872 counties, no family planning programs for medically indigent women were identified. One hundred and twenty-two counties reported programs, but were not able to provide figures on the number of women served; they are included among the 1,200 counties with reported programs.

The 1,200 counties reporting organized family planning programs make up 39 per cent of U. S. counties; they also contain approximately 75 per cent of the total U. S. population, and of women aged 15-44, as well as the same proportion of low-income women in need of subsidized family planning services. Almost 800,000 women received subsidized services within these (1,200) counties, which amounts to about 15 per cent of all the women in the U. S. who are estimated to be in need of family planning services (Table 1a). At risk and remaining to be served in the counties with reported programs, were 3.2 million women, or 70 per cent of the total number of women who are unserved in the U. S.

While only 15 per cent of the women in need are being served nationally, there is, of course, great variation from county to county in the current service picture; a few counties were found to provide service to more than 40 per cent of the group at risk, while others reported less than 1 per cent. Among the 1,200 counties reporting services, 20 per cent of those at risk are being served. We still have a long way to go.

The 1,872 counties without reported programs constitute 61 per cent of all U. S. counties but they contain only about 25 per cent of the total U. S. population, about the same proportion of women age 15-44, and 1.4 million or 27 per cent of all low-income U. S. women at risk and in need of family planning. Since no programs are reported, unserved females also equal 1.4 million and unmet need equals 100 per cent.

In summary, about three-fifths of U. S. counties contain one-quarter of those at risk and report no organized programs; conversely, two-fifths of U. S. counties contain three-quarters of those at risk in the entire country and report service to about one-fifth of this group (Table 1). Since the two-fifths of U. S. counties with service contain roughly three-quarters of the U. S. population, it is obvious that these include most of the major urban areas in the country, where need is more highly concentrated. On the other hand, as noted earlier, the 1,872 counties with no organized programs contain only about 1.4 million women at risk, indicating that the need is much less concentrated in these counties.

Table 2 shows the distribution of counties ranked by quartiles of women served in the 1,200 counties with reported organized programs. The significant finding here is the concentration of service in relatively few counties: 8 counties, or 0.3 per cent of all U. S. counties, account for the first quartile in which about 200,000 women were served (or 25 per cent of reported services). Only 23 more counties, or 0.7 per cent of all U. S. counties, account for the next quartile—200,000 women served. Expressed cumulatively, 31 or only 1 per cent of all U. S. counties account for 50 per cent of all women reported served in subsidized family planning programs throughout the United States.

Going one step further, the next quartile adds 86 counties. Thus, 117 counties, or 4 per cent of U. S. counties, account for 75 per cent of women reported served; that is, 600,000 out of 800,000 served throughout the U. S. This obviously reflects concentration of program inputs and, as will be shown later in more detail, those service areas include nearly all of the great urban counties where population is concentrated, where needs are most obvious, and where resources for delivery of services are most readily at hand.

Finally, the last quartile of women are served in 961 counties; these are for the most part quite small programs. On an average basis, there are about 200 women per county receiving service in the latter group of counties through all delivery agencies (although in most of these counties only one agency is usually providing services).

Table 3 shows the distribution of quartiles of unmet need: that is, the number of women estimated to be in need of subsidized family planning services but not reported as receiving them, and the number of counties in each quartile. There are approximately 4.6 million women still in need of service.

Here, too, great concentration is evident: relatively few counties in the U. S., 69 in all, account for 25 per cent of the unmet need. The next quartile of unmet need involves 244 additional counties. Thus half of the unmet need of 2.3 million women is found in 313 counties (about 10 per cent of all counties).

It can be noted at this point that most counties with the greatest need figures are also found heading the list of counties with the largest program inputs. For example, if one compares the 50 counties with the greatest need to the first 50, by numbers served, 29 appear on both lists, indicating that there is fair correspondence between location of needs and service efforts. However, the magnitude of the input relative to need is as yet grossly insufficient, inasmuch as several million women remain to be reached and over one million of these are in relatively concentrated target areas in only 69 U. S. counties.

Table 3 shows that the fourth quartile of unmet need is spread over a vast area involving 2,133 counties. While these counties include some metropolitan areas, they are for the most part rural and rural-farm areas with small and dispersed populations and with few health resources, making it difficult and costly to reach the patient.

Table 4 expands on reported services as presented initially in Table 2. In Table 4, as in the earlier table, the number of women served is the controlling variable. The eight counties comprising the first quartile are detailed in Table 4 and vividly illustrate how service inputs have been concentrated in major urban areas. It was to show this that the county, state, and major city identifications were provided. Note that the East appears to be first with three New York City counties, Baltimore, and Washington, D. C. The Midwest is represented by Cook County (Chicago) and Wayne County (Detroit). Finally, in the Far West, we have Los Angeles County.

For proportion of those in need who are served, these areas represent fairly substantial program achievements when compared to the national average: in these eight counties 42 per cent were served—200,000 of 471,000 in need—whereas nationally only 15 per cent were served.

In the second quartile, involving 23 counties, 36 per cent of those at risk were served, in the third quartile 23 per cent, and in the fourth—the least densely populated counties of the U. S.—only 10 per cent. The column labeled "total population" illustrates the increasing dispersion as one moves from high to low service areas. The first eight counties contain as many people as the next 23. The next 86 counties contain fewer people than the first two groups of 31 counties, and so on. The data make clear that the question of providing family planning services in those areas where population is spread thin has only begun to be examined. Indeed, this is generally true for nearly all health services, not merely family planning.

Table 5 presents data on the population size and the range of the percentage of rural-farm population in the 1,200 counties reporting service figures, arranged again by quartiles of women served. It can be seen from the range of population size that, while in general the counties with least service in the fourth quartile must include many sparsely populated areas, they are not exclusively so. One county in this quartile contains 1.3 million people—suggesting that even in large urban areas the extent of programing for family planning services is severely deficient.

It appears that the first two quartiles, accounting for half of the women served, are comprised exclusively of high-population counties. For example, in quartile two the smallest county by population size is 320,000. Very few of these 31 counties in the first quartiles have any rural-farm population.

The third quartile contains counties that range from relatively small—25,000 population—up to quite large—1.4 million—and show a wide variation in percentage of rural-farm population.

In the fourth quartile, there is a tremendous range, both of population size —from less than 1,000 to 1.3 million— and of rurality—from zero to 59.5 per cent (an inordinately high proportion to be classified as rural-farm). These 1,083 counties are a great mixture of county types, including some highly urban areas which are in fact part of great metropolitan centers (i.e., Boston, Massachusetts; Passaic, New Jersey; Suffolk County, New York) as well as some of the most rural parts of the United States.

It is obviously not always possible to categorize counties as urban or rural-farm areas. The usual problems of classification plague the researcher on this as on so many other dimensions. For, within a single county, there may be extensive urban as well as rural-farm areas. The socioeconomic ecology of a region does not usually oblige us by observing county jurisdictional lines. This factor often results in the mixture of characteristics demonstrated in the tables. Table 6 provides an overview of the number of women unserved with respect to the rural-farm characteristics. All U. S. counties have been ranked from low to high according to per cent rural-farm, and then distributed by quarters by the number of women needing subsidized family planning service. In addition, the number of counties for each quarter with no reported programs are shown.

The 121 least rural counties contain a quarter of the number of women needing service (1.15 million). No county within this group exceeds 0.9 per cent of rural-farm population; and only 26 or one-fifth of these counties report no program. In the next group, all counties show a small proportion of rural-farm population, not less than 1 per cent and not more than 5 per cent. Here also a small number of counties, about one-eighth, report no program.

Group three moves into the middle to upper range with respect to rurality, and this includes 28.5 per cent of all U. S. counties; 500 or 57 per cent of these report no programs. Finally, in group four, we are really in the country. These are predominately rural counties and include over half of all counties in the U. S. Seventy-five per cent of these counties report no program. As rurality increases, programing decreases.

controlled by the range of estimated number of women in need. The total number of women in need is also presented for each group of counties.

Line two in the table shows that a total of 438, or 24 per cent of counties with no program, contain 1,000 or more women at risk; cumulatively, these counties contain a total of 819,000, or 56 per cent, of all those unserved in counties without programs. They should be regarded as areas with high program potential since they contain 1,000 or more women at risk.

The figure of 1,000 or more women per county at risk and in need is a useful measure of the service potential in these areas, since it is estimated that this number of patients is sufficient to provide minimum economy of scale in the operation of a clinic program.

The remaining two groups, totaling three-quarters of all U. S. counties without programs, are the more sparsely populated ones and account for 44 per cent of women at risk in unserved areas.

Summary

This paper has presented in broad terms the distribution and concentration of needs and services in the United States by county.

Of particular note is the concentration in relatively few urban counties of both the heaviest program inputs as well as the greatest number of women unserved. Equally important, a program potential exists in 438 counties with no service provided and more than 1,000 women at risk.

The data also point up the virtual nonexistence of organized programs in sparsely populated and rural-farm areas of the United States. In qualitative human terms, the need for family planning programs here is undoubtedly just as great as in metropolitan communities.

APPENDIX

What Is in the File—for Each County in the United States.

a. Needs and Services

Total population of U. S., 1966; women in the childbearing years, i.e., 15-44; number of women medically indigent needing subsidized family planning services; number receiving family planning services through subsidized clinic programs; number in need not receiving services, or unmet need; number of home-based migrant workers; number of American Indians under the jurisdiction of the Indian Health Service of DHEW.

Under needs we have also selected health and demographic indexes which provide greater insight into the characteristics of each county: infant mortality rate; number of infant deaths in excess of 17.8 per 1,000 for the five years 1961-1965; fertility rate per 1,000; live birth order as a per cent of all births; out-of-wedlock births per 1,000 live births (not reported for 16 states); births of 2,500 grams or less as a per cent of live births.

Each county is classified by whether it is within a Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area or State Economic Area (for New England) or a nonmetropolitan county according to total population of SMSA, SEA or county.

b. Resources

Physicians—Number of nonfederal physicians in patient care with offices in the county; ratio of M.D.'s per 100,000 population; number of general practitioners; ratio per 100,000 population; number of obstetrician-gynecologists and ratio per 100,000 population.

Hospitals—For all short-term, general-care, nonprofit hospitals reporting births, operated by private agencies, nonfederal governmental agencies, but including the Public Health Service and Indian Health Service hospitals: number in each county; total births reported for all hospitals in the county; number reporting family planning services.

Other Resources — Counties with medical schools; community action agencies; OEO-funded Family Planning Projects; OEO-funded Neighborhood Health Centers; counties with Model City Programs; Children's Bureau Maternal and Infant Care Projects; Public Health Service Neighborhood Service Projects; counties where the health department provides family planning services; and finally, counties where Planned Parenthood affiliates provide family planning services.

To what extent can greater accessibility to abortion services affect poverty and its problems? This analysis addresses itself to such questions and develops proposals for identifying the socioeconomic impact of liberalized abortion laws and accessible services.

SOCIOECONOMIC OUTCOMES OF RESTRICTED ACCESS TO ABORTION

Charlotte Muller, Ph.D., F.A.P.H.A.

THE recent changes in the legality of abortion in the United States through repeal, reform and court action, and the various court cases and legislative movements in the current news, have changed the nature of the problem of access to a large degree. Once chiefly a matter of leveling legal barriers, the access problem now relates to financing, referral, organization of appropriate facilities for care, and patient factors influencing utilization in different social and age groups. The implications of restricted access to care, the subject of the present paper, apply, for different reasons, to post-repeal states (Alaska, Hawaii, New York and Washington), to reform ("health and life"*) states such as California, and to states with old-style laws, which still constitute the majority.

The small market for legal abortions in states with old-style laws has been restricted in access to a certain number of women of means who are able to procure private medical and psychiatric care[8] in hospitals amenities. Meanwhile, their less affluent sisters have rarely been able to receive medically equivalent care in the wards of public hospitals and as service patients in voluntary hospitals. These facts have been well-documented by Hall for hospitals in New York City, New York State, and the United States in reports showing ward/private differences in the ratio of abortions to deliveries, and similar differences between public and other hospitals.[5,6]

The far larger market for illegal abortions (and now, for out-of-state legal abortions) has also been class-structured in that it was the non-poor candidate who could afford jet travel to a service area or the attentions of a qualified physician, although without hospital protections or amenities, in an illegal abortion. The poor candidate was more likely to end up in the hands of the non-medical practitioner or to substitute crude attempts at self-induced abortion through chemical and physical means.

Imperfection in the market inheres in uneven access to knowledge of sources of supply as well as in uneven access to suppliers for economic, social class, and geographical reasons. The result of market imperfections including legal constraints on entry is a lessening of consumer welfare, and in particular, a restriction on the option of couples to choose a fertility level consistent with their total set of preferences for leisure, material goods, the company of children,

Unlike some other health services, the improved accessibility of abortion (which for the poor is a matter of present concern) is evidently a service whose utilization greatly rises in the event of legal accessibility. This is shown by the experience of countries which have passed laws broadening the grounds for abortion to include health as well as life of the mother and admitting socioeconomic considerations. It is also shown in states like California and Colorado which have liberalized the law.[1] A more advanced law in Great Britain was followed by a shift in performance of abortions from private auspices to National Health Service financing, as well as an over-all rise.[16] With wider legal access, the seeking of inferior substitutes, including attempts at self-induced abortion, will doubtless decline, with direct improvement in the maternal death rate among black and Puerto Rican women.[4] It is not clear that all latent demand would be satisfied: some women are held back by the lack of privacy of official procedures, and review committees as in states where "health and life" are accepted grounds; some physicians would continue to refuse to perform the operations; and, some women would deny the reality of the pregnancy until late in its course as they now do. The price of the service would still be a factor in utilization, although it is not easy to say just how elastic the demand is where the legal barrier exists.

Barriers to legal abortion affect the ratio of unwanted children born. Low-income couples express the same family-size goals as higher income couples,[7a] but are less successful, on the whole, in the use of contraception. The leverage power of abortion in adapting actual to desired family size is thus of relatively greater importance for low-income groups.

However, it is necessary to have a limited expectation of the extent to which, based on the foregoing, reduction in unwanted births will solve poverty problems. So long as poor couples desire 3 or 4 children—or more—available means of birth prevention would not necessarily be used to control family size and per capita income would remain low. And, independent of family size among the poor, the reduction of poverty requires a variety of specific programs to deal with low job skills, deficient labor market organization, family health needs, and income maintenance problems, to cite a few items on the national agenda.

The negative effect of unwanted births on family economic and social welfare is felt by way of defects in the timing of the first birth, defects in spacing the interval between children, which affects family capacity to accept the new child, and defects in terminating family formation. Although the reduction of welfare is really the joint result of limitations of the present arrangements for birth control (deficient access, failure to utilize and imperfections in method) and of restricted access to abortion, it is nevertheless possible to avert negative outcomes by better availability of abortion alone, and this is especially true, for the reason cited above, for low-income groups.

One of the important situations relates to the separation of the teen-age male from the educational process.

Alvin Schorr has beautifully presented the mechanism and the evidence linking the family cycle and economic life. Early marriage is generally forced marriage, the result of premature pregnancy. The young father leaves school and cannot return. His bargaining power in the job market is poor and his first job choices are in low-opportunity situations as a result of immediate necessity, lack of information, and low skill. He may also fail to find work. The marriage of the young is less stable, statistically speaking, than that of a later age, but the probability of a large family is also associated with early age of marriage. Whether the family is separated or united, the burden of support prevents the young adult from experimenting with various types of work. And the family fails to accumulate capital for any decisive improvement in circumstances such as additional training.

Statistical support for this model includes:

1. The high per cent of premarital pregnancy in school-age marriage (one-third of all school age marriages, 87% where both spouses were high school students).

2. The larger family size for both white and black mothers who marry at 18 compared with 2 or 3 years later (white, 3.7 compared with 2.8 children; black, 4.3 compared with 4.0 children). This comparison also reveals the limited success of black families at birth control, with age of marriage having less effect on family size than among whites.

3. The occupational distribution of teen-age males compared with older workers.[15]

In 1966 there were 1.2 million young males aged 16 to 21 who were school dropouts and members of the labor force. Sixty-one per cent of them worked as operatives and non-farm laborers.[21a] (This number rose to 1.6 million in 1969.)[21b]

The crucial outcome in terms of the economic history of the teen-age male is the reduced lifetime earnings of a man who has not completed high school, and again the greater earnings of the college graduate compared to the high school graduate.* Differences also show up in a cross-section. Let us compare just two educational levels within white and black groups. Money income figures for 1968 by years of school completed show 5.9 million white family heads who are college graduates with median income of $13,589, and 7.1 million who started but did not finish high school with median income of $8,525. In non-white families, where the head finished college, the family income was $12,472 (267,000 families); where he started but did not finish high school (1.0 million families), the median income was only $5,766.[21c]

The ratios implicit in the above income figures would be altered with changes in the relative supply of males at the different educational levels, and are also influenced by the structure of demand for workers at different levels. But the return on human capital added by educational processing is real, and it is estimated that four-fifths of high school dropouts are intellectually capable of additional education.[20]

Another problem for economic improvement in the family concerns job-seeking by the mature woman with children. The crucial statistic is that median family income (1968) is 30 per cent higher for families with a male head when the wife is in the paid labor force than when she is not.[21d] The presence of children under six is a deterrent to labor force participation.[22] It is true that an untrained woman may not add greatly to family resources by her employment. What this implies, perhaps, is that training programs are needed to capitalize on the economic opportunity presented to the family by the mother's freedom from pregnancy. It also calls attention to the compulsory school-leaving for girls consequent on pregnancy in many communities, a factor which adds to the effect on long-run family earning potential described above for teen-age males. Girls who started their families in their teens, in their maturity make up a portion of the group of untrained women. Finally, for married women, mothers of young children, who must work out of financial necessity—18 per cent of those who took jobs in 1963 did so for this reason[24]—unsatisfactory arrangements for child care represent a family price that is paid for their labor force participation and a possible source of fluctuating availability for work. To a considerable degree this is also true for middle-class women who wish to work for personal satisfaction and extra income.

* Data for 1968 estimate lifetime incomes for males 25 years and over by years of schooling: 1-3 years of high school, $294,000; 4 years of high school, $350,000; 4 or more years of college, $586,000. (Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1970, p. 111.)

Like the married woman returning to the labor market, the young widow is available for employment to an extent dictated by the age of her youngest child and the number of her children. Half of widowed mothers with 3 or more children did not work at all in 1962, compared with 28 per cent with only one child, and the former group tended to work part-time, if at all. Since part-time employment is in lower-paying occupations, earning power was doubly affected. Furthermore, employment and earnings after termination of child care benefits under Social Security are found to be greatly affected by work experience in the preceding 5 years. Hence, the economic potential of young widows is greatly influenced by size and spacing of families.[29]

A third economic problem exacerbated by uncontrolled family size is present poverty. According to Mollie Orshansky,

> "The family with 5 or more children was still (in 1966) 3½ times as likely to be poor as the family raising only one or two, and . . . almost half the poor children were in families with 5 or more children."[12a]

She further points out that large family size (4 or more children) was found in an increasing number of poor families where the head was a fully employed worker (37% in 1965).[12b] How poor is poor? The median income of a poor family with male head in 1966 was $3,308 for a 4-child family, $3,590 for a 5-child family, and $3,410 for a family of 6 or more children.[12c]

About one-fourth of poor families, and about one-fifth of near-poor families, had 4 or more children[12d]—or 2,214,000 out of 15,240,000 families in the poor and near-poor categories.

The family income figures for the large poor family are equivalent to per capita income of $552, $513, and $430 (or less) respectively. In sharp contrast the lowest budget standard for a 4-person urban family, as priced by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1967, was $5,915 or $1,479 per capita.[23]

The immediate consequence of spreading fixed family resources over more persons is fewer goods and services per capita. Transfer payments received by about one-fourth of the poor (assistance, Social Security payments, veterans' pensions, and other devices to transfer current national income between persons by the tax-spending mechanism) are already counted in current income. Even with public assistance the large poor family could not hope to consume at anywhere near the lowest budget standard of the BLS.

Children who lack a welcoming and nurturing parental home can be counted along a continuum of extrusion from the family of origin. The continuum includes adoption, foster home placement, court action for neglect and dependency and less severe but indifferent or otherwise unsatisfactory parental role performance within the family of origin. To count numbers involved is to become cognizant of the numbers of children affected by various degrees and causes of being unwanted during childhood, although one cannot infer that the child was unwanted during the pregnancy. The program costs involved, as in foster or institutional care, must be reduced by the amount of the maintenance component, which would be incurred (although not necessarily at the same level), regardless of where a child is raised. However, program costs would be higher if services such as schooling for pregnant girls were more adequate.

One measure of children with a problem related to their birth is out-of-wedlock births. The number in 1967 was 318,072, with the figure expected to reach 403,000 by 1980 without any increase in rate. (The rate was 21 births per 1,000 unmarried women ages 15–44 in 1967.) Forty-seven per cent of these births are to girls under 20 years of age.[11] Illegitimate births were 9.7 per cent of total live births in 1966.[21e] Occasionally, out-of-wedlock births are not unwanted, and some are followed by marriage.[14] If this indicates that the figure overstates the problem, it should be remembered that many births in married women are undesired as well as unplanned. One even finds children placed for adoption with both parents living and together. Both in this group and in children retained in the family origin are children born after pregnancy has been followed by marriage.

Another aggregate cited is the number of children given for adoption. This group numbered 158,000 in 1967, or 82.3 per 10,000 children under 5,[21f] but only two-thirds of these were out-of-wedlock births.[18] Extra-legal but permanent adoptions add to these figures.

Many children are not adoptable because of defect or retention of parental rights by incompetent parents or for reasons of racial or religious prejudice. Yet adoptions certainly provide a minimum estimate for the occurrence of preventable births.

The unwanted child is not necessarily indicated by birth order. A wealthy family can provide for a fourth or fifth child materially, and with personal care. A poor family, or one where the mother has a health impairment, may not be able to welcome a third child. Nevertheless birth order, especially in conjunction with income level, is a useful measure of the problem of preventable births. Orshanky's figures yield a count of at least 2.2 million fourth children in birth order among the poor and near-poor, 1.3 million fifth children, and .7 million sixth children.[12e] These figures may be compared with average family size preferences of 2.9 children for non-whites and 3.3 for whites.

It may be pointed out here that in a study of cases of severe parental neglect, the average family size was 8 people. The neglectful family was cited as having inadequate diet, irregular meals and poor food preparation; lack of cleanliness, absence of routine; and neglect of medical problems. Apathy was the predominant attitude. There was a lack of internal and external means for building a positive life-style. The children were often having trouble in school.[30]

The possibility of identifying unwanted children by comparing family-size goals with family size achieved depends on the time at which desired family size is ascertained, since people adapt their announced goals in the event of pregnancy (and a portion of them even succeed in adapting their attitudes and behavior).[3] Conversely, a child originally desired may become unwanted because of the likelihood of deformity, the death or disability of a parent, income change—or the breakup of the marriage. (This change in status of the child has a bearing on the question of abortion only insofar as the change occurs soon after conception.)

If correct, this comparison is a powerful measure. It reveals between 750,000 and 1,000,000 excess births a year between 1960 and 1965. These figures are based on a re-analysis of 1965 national survey data by Charles F. Westoff. The lower estimate is based on births unwanted by both parents, and the higher, on births unwanted by at least one parent. If one uses the higher estimate, 445,000 births among the poor and near-poor are classed as excess, or 42 per cent of all their births, compared with 17 per cent among the non-poor. The incidence of unwanted births increases rapidly with birth order. The estimates cited are minimal in that births retrospectively rationalized by the parents, and births representing timing failures, are omitted.[32]

Children born and living their early years under psychological rejection by mothers, social abandonment by fathers, poverty and other disadvantaged conditions, are exposed to risk of impaired development which, regardless of all other consequences, is economically important as a cause of inferior earning power at maturity. In the several aspects of this problem to be discussed, it is suggested that it is chiefly impaired educational chances which threaten future economic potential. Let us look first at mental retardation.

Seeking of prenatal care late in pregnancy, and inadequate nutrition, are typical or frequent in unwanted pregnancies. At least for high-risk mothers, late care and nutritive lacks are a factor in complications and prematurity, which in turn are found to be related to impaired learning potential. Pasamanick has pointed out that very young mothers and older women had a higher risk of producing mentally defective children, and increasing birth order also increased the risk.[13a] It has also been noted that the extra medical risks of pregnancy among the very young are complicated by the unmarried status and poverty of the adolescent girl typically involved.[17]

Although the status of being unwanted does not predict a certain incidence of mental retardation, in the sense of being either a necessary or a sufficient cause, it is pertinent that of the many births among the poor, who are exposed to the hazards which may lead to mental retardation, a large per cent appear to be unwanted.

Since mental retardation is a multicaused phenomenon in which the nurture, educational stimulation and social opportunities of the child affect outcome, it is surmised that a mild handicap (the more typical case) is continually reinforced in the large, poor, culturally isolated family.

Furthermore, once adolescence is reached, access to higher education and to jobs with responsibility for large assets is dependent on being in the upper track of learners. The chance to increase earning power either by adding to human capital or by associating with expensive cooperating factors of production is impaired by mild mental retardation.

General mental health of the infant is said to be affected by the same considerations of the prenatal environment as applied to development of learning capacity. Pasamanick mentions 5 clinical entities in children significantly associated with complications of pregnancy and prematurity: cerebral palsy, epilepsy, mental deficiency, behavior disorders and reading disabilities.[13b] "Cases" differ from controls not in operative procedures or in long and difficult labor, but in long toxemias and bleeding —i.e., in medical rather than obstetrical features. Summing up, Pasamanick states:

> "There exists a continuum of reproductive insult, at least partially socio-economically determined, resulting in a continuum of reproductive casualty extending from death through varying degrees of neuropsychiatric disability."[13c]

Acceptance by and interaction with parents continues to be an influential factor in the course of mental health throughout childhood.[10,27]

In a study of cases of children requiring agency foster care in New York City, 10 per cent of initial placements were due to severe neglect or abuse and 33 per cent to family problems including rejection milder than the preceding category.[9] An annual figure of 154,000, 2.1 per 1,000 children, for juvenile court cases of dependency or neglect, in jurisdictions covering two-thirds of the population under 18, is said to be an understatement of the incidence of this problem.[19a]

Impaired mental health interferes with the formal educational process (for example, when there is a behavior problem in the classroom) and with socialization of the child so that he can perform in the labor market at the maximum level for his capacities. At the extreme, delinquency and punishment or other social response removes him from the conventional developmental sequence. It is noted that delinquents often come from broken homes or have many brothers and sisters. A correlation is also noted between adolescent misbehavior and the absence of the father or limited opportunity to identify with him.[28a] (We note about 700,000 children in juvenile delinquency cases in 1967, or 2.3 per cent of those between 10 and 17 years, and an upward trend in rate.)[19b]

Educational growth of the child is recognized to be handicapped in the large family where income and parental time are inadequate. (Income is a substitute for time as when the mother reads to the four-year-old while a sitter walks the baby, or when the four-year-old is sent to a private nursery school while the mother tends the baby.) This problem is broader than the case of actual retardation or diagnosed mental illness in a child.[28b]

Finally, the large poor family is less likely to secure medical attention for its children.[26] The number of school days lost because of illness is greater than for higher income groups.[25] Nutritional defects add to time of recovery after infection and are related to days of school missed. Continuous school attendance has significance for development of human capital.

Summary

It is difficult to assign a weight to the importance of births in excess of desired family size, or births ill-timed in terms of family welfare, in the creation of social problems of neglect, delinquency, psychological and social incapacity to care for children, and the like. Nor is it easy to isolate the effects of this factor on the set of job vs. education choices made by the young father, the difficulties faced by the mature woman in planning re-entry to the labor market, and the experience of being a youthful consumer at the poverty-level of income. Equally, the underdevelopment of human capital by reason of mental retardation, physical and psychiatric health problems, and educational undernourishment defies exact division among specific causes. However well research methods for dealing with multi-caused phenomena succeed in elucidating these relationships in the future, there is in any event food for thought in the present. Ability to control family-size, including the right to abortion, must essentially seek approval on its merits. Personal freedom, equal access to care, and medical protection of the poor are all involved. Yet the discussion cannot help being influenced by observed associations between unplanned births and poverty, untimely marriage, and creation of stress on parental capacities of the more vulnerable for whatever reason.

Future Research

The design of relevant research concerning access to, and financing of, abortion services calls for flexibility because of the fluid situation which now exists with respect to law and policy. If realistic, such research can be useful in guiding policy choices.

1. Financial needs of patient groups can be identified by studying total service costs under different marital, social, racial and medical-clinical situations of the patient. Women who have had illegal abortions appear to be more willing than it was previously assumed to reveal information bearing on incidence, prevalence, and attendant circumstances.[31] Legality should improve the information flow. This may make it possible to develop estimates for direct costs for medical care and associated travel, and for the indirect costs of lost work-time and child-care replacement, both on a per case basis, and for aggregates. The present cost of surgery, hospital days, and pregnancy tests, determined by familiar methods of medical care research, can serve as a guide to the program expenditures that would be necessary to assure economic access for the low-income woman as state laws yield to the reform movement.

2. Systematic observation of the medical and behavioral effects of non-hospital service programs, and of the use of manpower and facility space resources which they entail, could be carried out as such programs are mounted. Such study will aid in developing and revising standards for a non-hospital service.

3. Understanding of one and two is essential for the design of an adequate prepayment benefit: this task needs to be supported by continuing surveillance of present coverage and gaps. Insurance entitlements for maternity in the private sector vary widely by employment group and carrier.[33] Nevertheless, a knowledge of current practice as to waiting periods, in-hospital care requirements, payment schedule limits, and family contract conditions is needed for policy purposes. Public sector entitlements have their own sources of geographical and program variation within military dependents, welfare and OEO medical care programs.

1. Finally, manpower needs are crucial in view of previous unmet demand. The assessment of additional training required to prepare practicing physicians and medical students to participate in the provision of abortion service is one task, and the appraisal of the attitude of professionals focuses on an element as important as numbers with requisite preparation. The possible role of paraprofessionals in a related theme for health manpower research. This is especially interesting, because in creation of a service able to handle a mass demand, traditional guild issues may be somewhat subdued.

States which have liberalized their abortion laws constitute a natural laboratory for the trial of new approaches in regard to financing, organization, manpower, and referral. Although little advantage has yet been taken of this fact, evaluation of early experience should be encouraged to aid in the development of appropriate social mechanisms for service.

One Hundred and Twenty Children Born After Application for Therapeutic Abortion Refused

Hans Forssman and Inga Thuwe

INTRODUCTION

The aim of the present study was to determine the mental health, social adjustment and educational level of children born after their mothers had applied for legal abortion on psychiatric grounds, and been refused. For this purpose we compared a series of children born of these pregnancies with an equally large control series, following all the subjects up to their 21st birthday.

Therapeutic abortion was first officially legalized in Sweden in 1939 and during the years of relevance to this study it was permissible on the following grounds (which are still valid):

When, because of disease, physical defect or weakness in the woman, the birth of the child would endanger her life or health.

When the pregnancy is the result of a felony, such as rape or incest, or intercourse with a girl under 15, or of the woman being made to submit to intercourse against her will because of being dependent on the man, or when it is any other way the result of gross violation of the woman's freedom of action.

Acta Psychiatrica Scandinavica, 42: 71-88, 1966

When the expected child might inherit a mental disease, mental deficiency, or a severe physical disease or deformity, either from its mother or father.

On July 1, 1946, the law was broadened to include the following indication:

When, in view of the woman's living conditions or other circumstances, it can be assumed that the birth and care of the expected child will seriously undermine her mental or physical health.

This indication came too late for the mothers of the present subjects. It has led to much debate in Sweden, but the psychiatrists at our hospitals seem to have based their recommendations for or against abortion on essentially the same grounds before 1946 as they did afterwards.

Much has been written about abortion during recent years. Among Swedish studies are: Lindberg's (1948) What does the woman do when the psychiatrist says no to her application for abortion?; the social worker Karin Malmfors' (1951) follow-up study of 200 women who had applied for abortion; Ekblad's follow-up study (1955) of 479 women granted an abortion on psychiatric indications; Arén & Åmark's (1957) study of the outcome in 244 cases of authorized but unperformed abortions; Arén's (1958) study of 100 newly delivered mothers who had a former pregnancy prematurely terminated on legal grounds; Kerstin Höök's (1963) follow-up study of 249 women refused a legal abortion. Schlaug (1952) studied the male partner in 488 cases of application for abortion. Ekblad's and Hook's publications also contained data on the men concerned.

Thus several studies have been made of the mothers and fathers involved in cases of abortion. But little has been written about the third member of the trio involved—the unwanted child. Arén & Åmark (1957) related that 12 out of 162 children born to women who had gone through with their pregnancy were sent to a foster home for permanent care or adoption. Malmfors (1951) related that 7 out of 85 children born after an application for abortion had been refused were left for adoption. These authors said nothing more about the fate of these children, and Arén & Åmark did not check their information in the official registers. Furthermore, both these studies were made between 3 and 5 years after the children were born, when they were too young to permit any conclusion about their mental health or social adjustment. Höök (1963) followed a number of features in 204 children in her series until they were 8 1/2 years old, on the average, the ages ranging from 7 to 11 1/2; 15 were left for adoption; the rest of her data about the children cannot be compared with any of the figures from the present study. This seems to be all that is written in Sweden about the fate of these unwanted children.

The Danish author F. B. Nielsen (1960), reported that, of 92 children born after application for abortion had been refused, 2 were stillborn, 82 healthy and 8 abnormal in some respect. But his children, too, were too young to permit any conclusion on their mental health and social adjustment.

It is beyond the scope of this investigation to go into the lengthy debate that has been going on about the legislation governing premature termination of pregnancy. Extensive reviews of this are given in the publications of Ekblad (1955) and Höök (1963).

The problem of abortion was given particular attention in the December 12, 1964, issue of the Lancet, which contained articles by Tredgold and by Uhrus and a leading article on the subject. The leading article concurred with the demand made at a meeting of U.S.A. specialists in 1955 for "more research into the background, motivation, mechanisms and results" of therapeutic termination of pregnancy.

As therapeutic abortion was not regularized by law in Sweden until January of 1939, it has hardly been possible until now to determine the long-term social and psychiatric consequences for the children born after application for abortion has been refused. In 1960 we published the preliminary results of this study in Swedish.

Material

Unwanted Children

The subjects studied came from Göteborg, Sweden's second largest city, with a population of about 280,000 at the time in question—1939-1942. During these years, the city had only one large general hospital, the Sahlgren Hospital. In October of 1938, a psychiatric department was opened at the hospital, and among its other activities, this department served as a counselling center for mothers seeking legal abortion. During the years of relevance to the present study, it was the only center of this kind in Göteborg. The few cases taken in hand by private practitioners during this period are not included in our series.

Thus, the material for this investigation originates from all the cases of women living in Göteborg who applied for a therapeutic abortion to the Psychiatric Department of the Sahlgren Hospital during the years 1939 to 1941, inclusive, and were refused. These included both the women coming only to the outpatient service and the ones hospitalized for observation. We took 1941 as the last year so that we could follow the children born of these pregnancies until the age of 21.

During the years 1939 to 1941, altogether 197 women living in Göteborg had 199 applications for legal abortion refused, 2 women having been refused for two pregnancies. These do not include any woman who changed her mind and took back her application. In 188 of the 199, the psychiatrist at the department decided against abortion, in 10 cases, which had been referred to the Medical Board, the Board refused to authorize the abortion, and in one case, also referred to the Medical Board, the Board authorized the abortion but the obstetrician refused to do the operation because the pregnancy had proceeded too far.

Three of the 197 women could not be traced. One was a refugee who lived only a short time in Sweden. It is impossible to explain why the other 2 could not be traced; they may have given a false name or only a temporary address. This left 194 women and 196 refused applications.

Sixty-eight of these 196 pregnancies ended in abortion, spontaneous or provoked. Sixty-eight out of 196 is a large percentage—34.7 percent—and undoubtedly many of them were illegal. Since the drop-out rate is indicative to some extent of the kind of subjects chosen for study—the narrower the indications for legal abortion, the greater the number of illegal abortions—it is interesting to compare this figure with those from other Nordic countries on the frequency of interrupted pregnancy after legal permission for abortion had been refused. There is not much point in comparing our figures with those of other than these countries because the conditions differ too much.

Lindberg (1948) found that only 50 (14.5 percent) did not give birth at the expected time out of all 344 women refused an authorized abortion after being admitted as inpatients to the Psychiatric Department of the Sahlgren Hospital between 1940 and 1946. Hultgren

(1959) found that 14.4 percent of 4,274 women whose petitions for abortion had been turned down by the Medical Board during 1954 to 1956 did not go through with their pregnancy; 224 of the 4,274 were from Göteborg, and 35 of these 224 (15.6 percent) did not go through with their pregnancy.

Thus the percentage of prematurely terminated pregnancies, spontaneous or provoked, was smaller in these two Swedish series than in ours. It is true that all Lindberg's women had been under observation as inpatients, as against only 49 of our 199. One probably does not get such a good psychotherapeutic grip on patients only coming to an outpatient service as one does when they are hospitalized. On the other hand, only 83 of 136 Danish women refused legal abortion after observation at the Psychiatric Department at Frederiksberg's Hospital went through with their pregnancies, the drop-out rate in this series thus amounting to 39 percent (Delcomyn, 1952).

A more probable explanation for the difference is this. Lindberg's series comes from 1940-1946, Hultgren's from 1954-1956, and ours from 1939-1941. In 1939 the number of legally authorized abortions in Sweden amounted to 439, in 1946 it rose to 2,378 and in 1951 it reached a peak of 6,328; it then fell slightly, amounting to about 5,000 in 1952-1954, 4,562 in 1955, and 3,851 in 1956. Another way of following the trend is to compare the number of legal abortions with the number of livebirths during the same period. During 1939 to 1942, 0.5 pregnancies were terminated by legal abortion for every hundred livebirths. In 1946 the proportion rose to 1.8, and in 1951 to 5.7. In 1952 and 1954 it was 4.8, in 1955 it was 4.3, and in 1956 it was 3.6.

In short, many more authorized abortions were done after than during the years of relevance to our investigation. Because it was harder to get permission for therapeutic abortion in 1939-1941 than later it is reasonable to assume that more illegal abortions were performed in our series than in later series. Delcomyn (1952), comparing the Danish figures for 1945-1949 with those for 1950 and the first half of 1951, found that there were relatively more authorized abortions in the second period, and also that a larger percentage of the women refused a legal abortion went through with their pregnancy the second period. She gave no figures for her observation.

Thus 128 of the pregnancies in our series (representing 126 women) proceeded to term. The result was 134 children, including 6 pairs of twins. Four of the 134 were stillborn, and 8 died within a year, one before it was 2 and one before it was 3. Excluding these 14 cases of early death left 120 children. The present study is based on these 120 all of whom reached the age of 21. They include 4 pairs of twins and 2 twins whose partners had died. Table 1 shows the 120 divided by year of birth and sex.

Control Children

All but 1 of the 120 unwanted children were registered in Goteborg when they were born. We chose control subjects for these 119 as follows: When the infant was born in one of the city's maternity hospitals, we took the next same-sexed child born in the same hospital for its control subject. For the 17 born elsewhere, we took the first same-sexed child registered in the city hospitals on the same day. When the control subject died before the age of 21, we replaced it with the first same-sexed child born after it in the same hospital. For control subjects for twins, we took the next pair of twins, same-sexed or bi-sexed as the case was, born in the same hospital. For the 2 children of twin birth, one of whose partners was stillborn and one died within 3 months, we chose control subjects as if the original children were singletons.

For the control subject of the child born outside Göteborg we took the next child of the same sex registered in the book of the same parish.

Sources of Data Analyzed*

From the civil and parish registry offices we found out: whether the would-not-be mother had had her child after her application was turned down; the addresses of the unwanted children and their control subjects from birth until they reached the age of 21; the marital status of the children and whether they in turn had had any children. One control subject lived in another country for six months when she was 18; apart from this we were able to follow every subject from the time they were born until they were 21.

From the child welfare boards (see p. 132) in the various districts in which the subjects had lived, we learned whether they had any of the subject's names in their files and, if so, why.

At the child-guidance clinics and youth psychiatry centers in the districts where the subjects lived or had lived we asked whether they had been consulted for mental deviation or illness in any of the subjects. We did the same at all the mental hospitals and psychiatric departments in general hospitals, and at all the psychiatric outpatient services in the districts where the subjects had lived after the age of 15. We also wrote to all the rural and urban psychiatric consulting bureaus run independently of the psychiatric departments in the general hospitals. We were not able to cover all the private practitioners who might have been consulted and we therefore disregarded anything we happened to hear from one of them having been consulted.

Sweden has a central penal register for the whole country, where every act of the authorities restricting the liberty of an individual is recorded, whether it be sentence to an adult or juvenile prison or internment in some other kind of an institution; also every instance of exemption from legal punishment because of legal irresponsibility, fines above a certain level and fines for crimes for which the alternative is penal servitude. All cases of conditional sentence are also recorded there. After receiving special permission from the government, we went through these files to see whether we could obtain any further evidence of antisocial conduct on the part of the subjects until they reached the age of 21.

*In these analyses we have called a P value of <0.05 probably significant, of <0.01 significant and of <0.001 highly significant

We also inquired at all the official temperance boards and social agencies in the districts where the subjects lived after the age of 16. (Not until 16 are persons registered in their own names in the records of the social agencies.)

We inquired about the subjects' schooling in the various school districts to which they belonged. Whenever they proceeded to secondary schools, we inquired at these schools whether they had gone on from them to other forms of study, and about any examinations they had passed. Thus we have full information on all the examinations the subjects passed prior to university. We then learned whether they had studied at any university before the age of 21 by going through the annual lists of the students enrolled at the various Swedish universities.

The information we got from the schools and the files of the social agencies showed that there was no point in inquiring at the agencies for the education and care of the mentally retarded.

In Sweden military service is obligatory for men, but not for women. We enquired at the Swedish Institute of Military Psychology about the fitness group into which the male subjects had been classed, and, if they had completed their military service, about how they had succeeded with their duties there. As a rule the young men must enroll for military service the year they become 18, but they can put it off up to the age of 21 or more for reasons of health or education. When they did this, we sometimes extended our limit beyond the 21st birthday in this one respect.

Three subjects (1 original and 2 control subjects) were the children of leading citizens in small communities, and we felt that it would be unfair to make inquiries about them in the local agencies in their neighborhood. But we got all the information we needed about them from other sources and there being no difference between them and the other subjects in depth of penetration we have included them with the others in the various analyses.

Differences Between Original and Control Series

Age, Maternal Age and Social Group

The ages of the two series of subjects correspond almost to the day. The greatest difference amounted to 25 days (twin cases).

The unwanted children were born to mothers 30 years old on the average, the control children to mothers of 28, on the average. There is a significant difference here ($0.01 > p > 0.005$).

We also compared the two series for the social group into which they were born, using the norms from the Swedish electoral statistics for the years 1937 to 1940. We did the grouping according to the father's occupation at the time, or if the mother was unmarried according to hers. Children adopted by couples neither of whom was their real parent, were grouped according to the occupation of the adoptive father at the time. But children adopted by men their mothers married after they were born were grouped according to their mothers' occupation when they were born. The result of this comparison is seen from table 2, which also shows how the inhabitants of Göteborg were distributed by social group in 1940.

More of the control than unwanted children were born into group II, and the reverse held for group III. Combining groups I and II gave 25 for the unwanted children and 36 for the control children, against 95 and 84 for group III. Thus the two series did not differ significantly in this respect ($p \simeq 0.10$), though no consideration was given to social group when choosing the control subjects.

Seventy-seven pairs, each consisting of one subject from either series, belonged to the same social group, 43 did not.

Results of Comparing Family and Social Environment of Unwanted and Control Children

Insecure Childhood

We considered that the following circumstances in the history of the subjects pointed to an insecure childhood background:

1. Complaints to a child welfare board about the way the subjects were being treated at home.

Every local authority district in Sweden is required to set up a child welfare board whose duty is to see that all children in its district are properly cared for. Up until 1960 the boards were required to interfere whenever children under 16 were being exposed to physical or mental harm through cruelty or neglect at home, or in danger of becoming delinquent because of their parents' depravity, negligence, or inability to bring up their children.

2. The child taken into custody by a child welfare board for protective care.

If consulting with, advising or warning the parents had no effect, or if the board decided that it would be a waste of time to try to persuade the parents to mend their ways, the board had the right to take the child away from its parents for protective custody.

3. Placement in a foster home.
4. Placement in a children's home.
5. Childhood in broken home, i.e. loss of a parent through divorce or death before the child was 15, or birth out of wedlock not followed by legitimization.

Table 3 shows how many subjects in either series were brought up under each of these circumstances. As seen there, 32 (26.7 percent) of the unwanted children were born out of wedlock, against only 9 (7.5 percent) of the control children. The difference is highly significant ($p < 0.001$). Eighty-six pairs (one member from each series) agreed in regard to legitimacy; 34 did not. The parents legitimized 5 of the 32 unwanted children born out of wedlock by getting married 2 to 24 months after they were born, and the parents of 5 of the 9 illegitimately born control children did the same 2 to 33 months later. Eight of the unwanted children were adopted by others than their real parents (7 of these were illegitimate). None of the control subjects were adopted.

According to the criteria laid down, 72 (60 percent) of the unwanted children had an insecure childhood, as against only 34 (28.3 percent) of the control children. If one disregards the stays in children's homes, many of which were for only a short while, the figures change to 65 (54.2 percent) against 26 (21.7 percent), and the difference remains highly significant ($p < 0.001$).

In short, it is obvious that the children born after an application for abortion had been refused ran a greater risk of insecurity in childhood than did their control subjects.

Disposition to Move to Other Local Authority Districts

There being more delinquency in cities than in other regions we determined how many of either series had stayed the whole time in Göteborg. Another reason for doing so was that we had unusually good possibilities of getting complete information about these subjects since our place of work is in Göteborg. We also checked whether they differed in tendency to move from place to place.

Seventy-seven (62.2 percent) of the unwanted children stayed in Göteborg until they were 21, and 85 (70.8 percent) of the control subjects. Twenty-one (17.5 percent) of the unwanted children had lived in three or more local authority districts, and 19 (15.8 percent) of the control subjects. Thus the two series agreed well, both for permanency of residence in Göteborg, and for tendency to move from one district to another. There were 55 pairs in which both the original and control subject had lived the whole time in Göteborg.

Results of Comparing Personal Data in Original and Control Series

Psychiatric Consultation and Hospitalization

Thirty-four of the unwanted children (28.3 percent) had gone to a psychiatric clinic of some kind or received psychiatric care in a hospital. The corresponding figure for the control subjects was 18, or 15 percent. The difference is probably significant ($0.025 > p > 0.01$).

Twenty-nine of the unwanted children had been under the care of a child psychiatrist, 28 only as an outpatient, and one as an inpatient as well. Six had visited a center for adult psychiatry; 3 of these had been hospitalized, one in a psychiatric department at a general hospital, one at a mental hospital, and one at both. One of the latter belonged to the 29 who had gone to an outpatient department for child and youth psychiatry.

Fifteen of the control subjects had visited a center for child psychiatry, all of them only for outpatient treatment. Four had been patients at a center for adult psychiatry, 2 as an outpatient, one at a mental hospital, and one at both a mental department in a general hospital and a mental hospital. One of these 4 belonged to the 15 who had gone to a center for child psychiatry.

The question arises: Was it because the mothers of the unwanted subjects had been in contact with psychiatrists before the children were born that so many of these children were registered at centers for child psychiatry? It may be that, having once consulted a psychiatrist, these mothers found it easier to do so again, whereas the mothers of the control subjects, who had seldom if ever consulted a psychiatrist about themselves, did not go to a psychiatrist for their children unless something was seriously wrong. Likewise, the mothers who had consulted a psychiatrist about abortion might be more apt than others to seek psychiatric advice for other personal troubles afterwards, and if they then complained about their children being nervous, the child might very likely be sent to a psychiatrist while the perhaps equally nervous children of other mothers might not.

In 1959 we determined how many of the mothers up to that year had consulted a psychiatrist for matters not directly concerned with the abortion, but only among the mothers of the 57 pairs in which both partners had lived in Göteborg all the time up to then. Twenty-seven of the 57 would-not-be mothers had gone to one of the municipal psychiatric outpatient departments for complaints not directly concerned with the abortion, and 10 of their children had done so. The corresponding figures for the control series were 9 and 0. It is apparent from this that it was not because the would-not-be mothers had consulted a psychiatrist about abortion that these children went more often than the others to a child psychiatrist. When all the subjects reached the age of 21, the number of pairs living the whole time in Göteborg dropped to 55, but we did not consider it worth while to do the analysis again for this sake.

Delinquency and Crime

Our figures for acts of delinquent nature reported to the child welfare boards do not cover drunken misconduct; this will be taken up in the next section.

Twenty-two (18.3 percent) of the unwanted subjects, 19 boys and 3 girls, were registered with the child welfare boards for delinquency, against 10 (8.3 percent) of the control subjects, 9 boys and one girl. The difference is probably significant ($p < 0.05$).

The boards had made investigations in 12 of the first 22 subjects and in 4 of the second to determine whether formal charges brought against them should be dropped. This happened 19 times in the original series, 8 times in the control series. Three of the first series and one of the second were removed from their homes and placed in protective custody elsewhere, in accordance with the law then in force, according to which correctional measures must be undertaken when children under 18 show severe forms of maladjustment. One of these 3 unwanted children, as well as the control subject, was sent to a reformatory.

The penal register contained the names of 10 of the unwanted children (8.3 percent) and of 3 control subjects (2.5 percent). The difference is not significant ($0.10 > p > 0.05$). Nine of the first 10 were male, one was female. The control subjects were all male.

Drunken Misconduct

The records of the official temperance boards contained the names of 19 of the unwanted children (15.8 percent) and 13 control subjects (10.8 percent) for drunken misconduct. The difference is not significant ($0.50 > p > 0.30$). Two of the first 19 subjects were women. The 13 control subjects were all men.

Public Assistance

Seventeen of the unwanted children (14.2 percent) had received some form of public assistance between the ages of 16 and 21, and 3 of the control subjects (2.5 percent). The difference is significant ($0.005 > p > 0.001$).

Only one subject, a boy in the control series, received a disablement pension from the government; he was an idiot and permanently institutionalized.

Educational Subnormality

Under this heading we included all the uneducable subjects, the ones taught in special schools for the mentally retarded, those whose last year at school was spent in a special class. In the last group we also included a few subjects whose educational subnormality was well documented, but who were taught in ordinary classes because there was no form of special training available for them.

The large cities have a graduated series of special classes in the ordinary schools called remedial reading classes, observation classes, extra classes and health classes, but we paid no attention to the kind of special class the subjects pupil attended, mostly because it depended on where they lived what kind of class they could choose from.

According to these criteria, 13 of the unwanted children (10.8 percent) were educationally subnormal, as against 6 of the control subjects (5.0 percent). This difference is not significant ($p = 0.10$).

There was one case of well documented mental retardation both in the original and in the control series.

Theoretical Studies Beyond the Obligatory

On drawing a line between the subjects who had done more advanced theoretical study than that required by the school law, and those who had not, we found that only 17 (14.2 percent) of the unwanted had had some form of higher education, as against 40 (33.3 percent) of the control subjects. The difference is highly significant ($p < 0.001$).

Eight unwanted and 12 control children had taken university entrance examinations. Five unwanted children and 11 control children had studied at a university. Neither of these differences is significant.

As mentioned (table 2), more of the control than original subjects came from social group II and the reverse was true for social group III. As a child's education depends a great deal on the social standing of its parents, we also compared the schooling in the two series after excluding the subjects left over when the two kinds of subjects were paired according to social group. This left 77 subjects in each series. Ten of these 77 (13.0 percent) unwanted children had had some form of higher education, against 21 of the 77 control children (27.3 percent). The difference is probably significant ($p < 0.05$).

One can also study the effect of social standing on the education by taking one social group at a time; for this we had to combine groups I and II, as there were too few cases in group I. Five of the 95 unwanted children (5.3 percent) coming from group III had had higher education, against 17 of the 84 control subjects (20.2 percent) coming from the same social group. The difference is significant ($p < 0.01$). The figures for group I + II were 11 out of 25 (44.0 percent) against 28 out of 36 (77.8 percent). Here the difference is probably significant ($p < 0.05$).

Continuing with these calculations, chi square amounts to 7.93 for social group III and to 5.89 for I and II combined. The sum, 13.82, with 2 degrees of freedom gives a p of <0.001, showing a highly significant difference for the three social groups combined.

Thus it was not differences in proportion of different social groups that caused the difference in schooling between the unwanted and control children.

Military Service

Ten of the 66 males in the original series (15.2 percent) were judged unfit for military service, either at the time of enrollment or after they had started, as opposed to 4 (6.7 percent) of the control subjects. This is not a significant difference ($0.20 > p > 0.10$). According to our information, 4 of the 10 first males were exempted for mental reasons; our information in this respect may not be complete, however. Two of the control subjects were exempted on these grounds.

When a Swedish recruit enrolls, he is classified into one of four groups according to his fitness for military service, from group 1 for a completely satisfactory condition down to group 4 who are assigned to fatigue duty. Apart from exemption from service, our two series were distributed very much alike by fitness for military service.

Marital Status and Parenthood

As we only followed our subjects up to the age of 21, we cannot say much about how they compare with regard to marriage and parenthood. Some differences did emerge, however.

Twenty of the unwanted children (17 women, 3 men) married before the age of 21, and 14 of the control subjects (9 women, 5 men). The difference is not significant here, either for the sexes combined or for one of them.

Two of the female subjects from the original series had also divorced before the age of 21; none of the control women had done so, and no man from either series.

We restricted our analysis of parenthood to the women, as there was no hope of getting reliable figures for the men in this respect.

Fourteen out of 54 women from the original series had had 19 children before they were 21, 4 out of wedlock, and 7 of the 54 female control subjects had had 9 children, 3 out of wedlock.

It is impossible to draw any conclusions from these figures. It will be noted, however, that the control series (which had more education on the whole) contained fewer cases of early marriage and of young mothers. This tallies with the observation that the age of marriage and parenthood rise with the degree of education.

Freedom From Defect in All Respects Studied

Sometimes the same subject will occur in more than one of the groups studied here. Thus a subject registered with the authorities for abuse of alcohol will often be found in the files of the centers for child psychiatry as well; a man who has been in a mental hospital will sometimes be exempted from military service; an uneducable subject will be registered as receiving public assistance, as being educated in a special class, and so on. It is interesting, therefore, to compare the two series for the number of subjects showing no defect in any of the respects studies, i.e., registration for antisocial behavior in the books of the child welfare boards or penal register; official registration for drunken misconduct; education in a special class or school, or uneducability; public assistance or government pension; visits to psychiatric inpatient or outpatient departments during childhood or adulthood. Fifty-eight (48.3 percent) of the unwanted children showed none of these defects against 82 (68.3 percent) of the control subjects. The difference is significant ($0.005 > p > 0.001$).

Taking social group III separately from I and II combined showed the following: Forty of the 95 unwanted children (42.1 percent) coming from group III showed no defect, against 54 of the 84 control subjects (64.3 percent) from the same group. The difference is significant ($0.005 > p > 0.001$). The corresponding figures for group I and II combined were 19 out of 25 (76.0 percent) against 28 out of 36 (77.8 percent). Here the difference is not significant.

The same analysis of the 77 pairs concordant for social group gave 34 unwanted cases (44.2 percent) showing no defect, against 54 control (70.1 percent). The difference is significant ($0.005 > p > 0.001$).

Similar analysis of the 55 pairs living in Göteborg the whole time gave 20 (36.4 percent) showing no defect against 38 (69.1 percent). The difference is highly significant ($p < 0.001$).

As children from broken homes are more apt than others to be antisocial and mentally disturbed, we compared the two series for the number of cases showing none of the aforementioned defects among the subjects who had lived with both their real parents until they were 15. Thirty-three out of the 60 such subjects from the original series (55.0 percent) showed none of these defects, and 68 out of the 98 control subjects of this category (69.4 percent). The difference is not significant ($0.10 > p > 0.05$).

Discussion

Table 4 gives a survey of the ways in which the children born after their mother had been refused a legal abortion differed from the control series of same-aged subjects chosen at random. As seen there, the unwanted children were worse off in every respect, the only exception being due to the one case of a government pension which came from the control series. The differences were often significant, and when they were not, they pointed in the same direction (except for the case just mentioned)—to a worse lot for the unwanted children.

When one looks for a reason for the differences, one is struck mostly by the greater frequency of factors tending to disrupt the stability of the home in the case of the unwanted children, such as birth out of wedlock, and death or divorce of their parents while they were still young. In other words, not as many unwanted children were brought up by both their real parents as were control subjects. Probably as a corollary of this, more of them were brought up by foster parents of in children's homes. But the latter may also have been a consequence of the greater number of complaints to the children's welfare boards about the way in which they were being treated at home.

The difference that turned up most consistently in various forms of analysis was the difference in amount of education. Whatever categories of subjects were studied—different social ranks or different subgroups of the same social rank—the unwanted children got a significantly smaller amount of education than the control subjects.

The reason the unwanted children had had so much contact with psychiatrists was probably not—as we showed—that their mothers found it easier to consult a psychiatrist about their child because they had once before consulted a psychiatrist about themselves. It was probably because these mothers were more vulnerable mentally than the others, and passed on this failing to their children, either through genes or through the effect it had on the home environment, or both.

The investigation has shown that children born after their mothers have been refused permission for legal abortion are born into a worse situation than other children. From this one may assume that the children who are not born because their mothers get authorization for abortion would have had to face still greater disadvantages, socially and mentally. Thus, the very fact that a woman seeks an authorized abortion, no matter how trivial her grounds may appear to some, means that the expected child will run a larger risk than its peers of an inferior standing in life. In our opinion, the present investigation shows that the provisions for therapeutic abortion in the law should not only aim to prevent the private tragedy; they should also aim to improve mental hygiene in a wider sense. Thus the legislation should also consider the social handicaps awaiting the unwanted child, not only, as it does now, the genetic risk in the narrow sense of the terms.

The authors examined 120 children born after their mothers had applied for therapeutic abortion on psychiatric grounds and been refused, comparing them with an appropriate control series of the same size. All the subjects studied lived and were followed up until the age of 21. Data were assembled from civil and ecclesiastical registry offices, social agencies, school authorities, military authorities and all the psychiatric inpatient and outpatient departments everywhere the subjects had lived. It was ascertained how many of each series had been registered for mental ill-health, antisocial and criminal actions, drunken misconduct, and different forms of public assistance; for the men it was ascertained how they had got on during their military service; likewise the marital status, number of children, and school ability and educational level was determined.

A study of the social features revealed that many more of the unwanted than control children had not had the advantage of a secure family life during childhood. They were also registered more often in psychiatric services, and a few more of them than control subjects received psychiatric care. They were more often registered for antisocial and criminal behavior, and slightly more often for drunken misconduct, and they got public assistance more often than the control subjects. A few more of them were educationally subnormal and far fewer had pursued theoretical studies over and above what is obligatory. They were more often exempted from military service. More of the females married early and had children early than in the control series. The differences between the two series in these respects were often statistically significant, and when they were not significant they always pointed in the same direction—to the unwanted children being born into a worse situation than the control children. Table 4 gives figures for most of the features just mentioned.

The authors conclude that the very fact a woman applies for legal abortion means that the prospective child runs a risk of having to surmount greater social and mental handicaps than its peers, even when the grounds for the application are so slight that it is refused. In their opinion, the legislation of therapeutic termination of pregnancy should also consider the social risks to which the expected child will be exposed.

The public health aspects of abortion have still not received the attention they deserve. After reviewing various facets of the problem with specific reference to hospitals in the United States, the author proposes emphasis on abortion law reform, promotion of sex education, and pursuit of an active contraceptive program.

ABORTION IN AMERICAN HOSPITALS

Robert E. Hall, M.D.

THE practice of abortion in American hospitals is inequitable, inconsistent, and largely illegal. The basic reason for this is that this aspect of twentieth-century medicine is governed by nineteenth-century laws.

With minor exceptions the laws in all 50 states permit abortion only "if necessary to preserve the life of the mother." Yet, as medicine has progressed, it has become apparent that considerations other than the preservation of maternal life are involved in the practice of abortion.

Only 25 years ago the risk to the maternal life of women with heart disease, diabetes, and tuberculosis was sufficient to warrant interruption of their pregnancies in compliance with the law. Most abortions then were done for such reasons. Now increased medical knowledge has enabled us to carry many of these women safely through pregnancy; but, at the same time, other medical discoveries have revealed to us equally valid reasons for therapeutic abortion, which do not necessarily entail danger to maternal life.

Need for Abortion Law Reform

Chief among these new-found indications are psychiatric disease and maternal rubella. The ominous implications of both of these conditions were not known when the abortion laws were written. Since the laws have not yet been changed in conformity with these advances in medical science, doctors today are forced to break the law in order to practice modern medicine. And since fully half of the hospital abortions today are performed for psychiatric disease and maternal rubella, it is readily apparent that the law is being broken fairly often.

In the United States, where abortion laws are strict, the ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births is 1:500 and the ratio of illegal abortions to hospital abortions is 100:1. In Denmark, where the abortion law is liberal, the ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births is 1:20 and the ratio of illegal abortions to hospital abortions is 4:1. In Japan, where abortion has been legalized, there are as many abortions as live births. These figures are based, of course, on educated estimates only, but they do serve to illustrate (a) that hospital abortions are exceptionally rare in this country and (b) that the demand for abortion is met illegally when it cannot be satisfied through legal channels. The one million criminal abortions thought to be performed in this country every year comprise a public health problem of pandemic proportions.

Needless to say, there are no statistics available to document the psycho-socio-medical sequelae of these million criminal abortions, but they are obviously extensive and they are suffered almost exclusively by those who cannot afford the skilled abortionist's fee. Infected abortion cases abound in our charity wards, not in our private pavilions. To a degree, the medical profession is responsible for this dichotomy through its inequitable distribution of therapeutic abortions among ward and private patients.

Rate of Therapeutic Abortions

National surveys bear testimony to the fact that hospital abortions are performed four times as often on the private services as on the ward services.[3,4] In New York City, between 1960 and 1962 the ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births in the proprietary hospitals was 1:250; on the private services of the voluntary hospitals, 1:400; on the ward services of the same voluntary hospitals, 1:1,400; and in the municipal hospitals, 1:10,000. The same inequity pertains to ethnic origin. The rate of therapeutic abortions per live births among white women in New York is 1 per 330, among nonwhites 1 per 2,000, and among Puerto Ricans 1 per 10,000. Approximately half of the puerperal deaths among New York's Negroes and Puerto Ricans are due to criminal abortions, as opposed to only a quarter of the puerperal deaths among white women.[2] Thus surely is a problem in preventive medicine which public health measures could help to solve.

Over all, criminal abortion as a cause of maternal mortality is on the upswing. Concurrently, the relative and absolute incidence of hospital abortion is decreasing. Whereas about 20 years ago there was one therapeutic abortion per 150 live births, now there is one per 500.[5] Aside from the lessened need for abortions on purely medical grounds, the principal reason for this decline has been the establishment of therapeutic abortion boards. These boards have become increasingly prevalent in the past 15 years, partly due to the mistaken belief that they are required by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals. At present, about half of our teaching hospitals have such boards.

In theory these boards serve to police the abortion practices of staff physicians, to prevent them from yielding to the pressure of undeserving patients, and to protect them from possible litigation. In fact these boards serve as medical tribunals which are frequently called upon to render moral judgments. Through the detachment typical of committees in general, this judgment is likely to be more academic than humane. After the establishment of such a board at Sloane Hospital, for example, the therapeutic abortion rate declined by one-third.[6]

Abortions for Rubella

It took many years to convince these boards that they should approve abortions for rubella. The ravages of rubella in pregnancy include a fetal death rate of 16 per cent, a prematurity rate of 16 per cent, a deformity rate of 17 per cent, and a 30 per cent incidence of congenital deafness.[12,6] Most of these dangers have been known to the medical profession for 25 years, but at first no abortions were done for this reason because it was argued that such abortions are, after all, illegal. The first rubella abortions were done under psychiatric guise upon the wives of insistent physicians. And now, as the knowledge of rubella deformities has become widespread, the general public has become equally insistent and obstetricians have been forced to comply with their demands in open defiance of the law. During the 1964 epidemic 329 such abortions were done in New York City alone.[3] Although most American hospitals now permit abortions for rubella, some do not. This inconsistency sometimes proves tragic to the individual rubella victim, for even the more liberal abortion committees usually refuse to approve the abortion of a woman who has had her previous obstetrical care at another hospital. As an illustration of the farcical extent of this situation, nine San Francisco obstetricians have been ordered to appear before the State Medical Board on the charge of unprofessional conduct for having performed therapeutic abortions for rubella, whereas at the same time in New York City a hospital is being sued for refusing to perform an abortion on a woman with documented first-trimester rubella which resulted in the birth of a deformed infant.

Abortions for Psychiatric Disease

A different set of inequities is associated with the psychiatric aspects of abortion. In order to comply with the law, abortions for psychiatric disease can be done only if there is a risk of suicide, yet suicide is known to be rare among pregnant women. In New York City, for example, where the suicide rate among women in the reproductive age range is 5.5 per 100,000, the rate among pregnant women in 1963 was 0.5 per 100,000.[7] For this reason, some hospitals refuse to sanction any abortions on psychiatric grounds.[12] In most hospitals, however, the psychiatrists are willing to exaggerate the risk of suicide in order to protect the overall well-being of their patients. As a consequence, about 40 per cent of today's hospital abortions are done for psychiatric conditions.[1,4,8,10,11] Needless to say, it is the private patient who most often profits from this rationale. At Sloane Hospital in the 1950's there was one abortion for psychiatric reasons per 1,119 deliveries on the ward service and one per 101 deliveries on the private service.[5]

Abortion policies vary not only from hospital to hospital but also from service to service within the same hospital. They also vary widely from doctor to doctor on the same service of the same hospital. In one of the large teaching hospitals in the East, for example, the individual abortion-to-delivery ratio of its staff members ranges from 1:110 to 1:11.

The victim of all this confusion is, of course, the American female. Even if she has a legitimate reason for therapeutic abortion she must find Doctor N in hospital Y with policy Z in order to have it done. If she makes the slightest deviation from this route she must seek a criminal abortion or raise an unwanted child. And it is the unwanted child of today who becomes the battered child of tomorrow.

A growing number of prestigious individuals and organizations have recently come to recognize the enormity of this problem and to recommend the abortion law reform necessary as a first step in its solution. Among these groups are the American Law Institute, the New York Civil Liberties Union, the New York Academy of Medicine, the California Medical Association, the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians, and the Unitarian Universalist Church. All of these groups have given public support to proposals at least as liberal as that recommended by the American Law Institute in its Model Penal Code, which provides that abortion should be permitted when the mother's mental or physical health is endangered, when there is a significant risk of fetal deformity, and in cases of rape and incest. Bills embodying these proposals have been introduced before the Legislatures of California and New York. Although considerably less liberal than the laws in Scandinavia, Japan, the Communist world, and the law soon to be enacted in England, these bills represent an enlightened effort to update archaic legislation.

Suggestions for APHA

The public health aspects of abortion have, in my opinion, been too long overlooked. One million cases of cholera every year would create a public health scandal, or even a million cases of rickets. But one million criminal abortions every year are embarrassingly ignored. There are three important approaches to this problem which the American Public Health Association would do well to consider: (1) The promotion of sex education in our schools. In granting that our children are participating in a sexual revolution, are we not remiss in failing to provide them with intelligent guidelines? (2) The pursuit of an active contraceptive program. In recognizing that birth control is an important public health measure, are we not remiss in failing to provide it as a public health service? (3) The sponsorship of abortion law reform. In conceding that the practice of abortion in American hospitals is inequitable, inconsistent, and largely illegal and that this situation is largely due to the impossibility of practicing twentieth-century medicine under nineteenth-century law, are we not remiss in failing as individuals and as organizations to stand up and be counted?

Therapeutic abortion, sterilization, and contraception

ROBERT E. HALL, M.D.
New York, New York

IN AN EFFORT to assess the current birth control practices in the United States, the experience of the Sloane Hospital for Women has been analyzed for the years 1951 through 1960 and a survey of 65 major American hospitals has been made. The data thus obtained will be presented in three separate parts: Therapeutic Abortion, Sterilization, and Contraception.

I. Therapeutic abortion

On Sept. 1, 1955, a Therapeutic Abortion Board was formed at Sloane Hospital. Prior to this date the mechanism for obtaining permission to perform an abortion, although it entailed approval of the Chief of Service, was considerably less formal. Since this date abortion applications have been reviewed by a three-member board composed of a senior obstetrician, internist, and psychiatrist. Because of this abrupt change in policy, the abortion cases for this study were selected from the time period between Sept. 1, 1950, and August 31, 1960.

Incidence. During these study years, the ratio of therapeutic abortions to deliveries was as follows:

	Ward	Private	Total
1950 through 1955	1:141	1:37	1:69
1950 through 1960	1:224	1:55	1:110

As can be seen from these figures the incidence of abortions following establishment of the Board has been almost precisely one third of that during the previous 5 years, and abortions were performed four times more frequently on the private service than on the ward service.

Case material. Of the 118 ward patients in this series, 69 were Caucasian, 47 were Negro, and 2 were Oriental. The Caucasian: Negro ratio of 1.5:1 is almost identical to the 1.4:1 ratio on the entire ward obstetrical service. Of the 248 private patients, 247 were Caucasian, none was Negro, and one was Oriental.

In the entire series, 15 patients were under the age of 20, 61 were between 20 and 24, 92 between 25 and 29, 84 between 30 and 34, 73 between 35 and 39, and 41 were more than 39 years old.

One hundred and ninety-nine patients were Protestant, 80 were Jewish, and 69 were Catholic. Twenty-two per cent of the white patients were Catholic.

Two hundred and seventy-six of the patients were married: 90 or 25 per cent were not.

Three hundred and nine or 84 per cent of the patients were less than 13 weeks pregnant, 51 were between 13 and 16 weeks, and 6 were between 17 and 20 weeks.

Type of surgery. The various surgical methods by which these abortions were performed are listed in Table I.

Indications. The indications for the abortions are presented in Table II.

Sterilizations. Sterilization procedures which were carried out in conjunction with therapeutic abortions are enumerated in Table III. Sterilizations were two and one-half times more common on the ward service.

Repeat abortions. The patients in this series who underwent more than one therapeutic abortion are recorded in Table IV. Twelve of these 20 women were sterilized at the time of their last abortion. The indications for the abortions were of a psychiatric nature in only 4 instances. Twelve were private patients and 8 were ward patients.

Legality. In New York State abortion is illegal "unless the same is necessary to preserve the life of the woman or of the child with which she is pregnant." The customary latitude adopted in interpreting this law is exemplified by the contrast between the arbitrarily compiled Groups A and B in Table V.

Experience at other hospitals. Questionnaires were sent to the directors of the obstetrical services of 65 randomly selected major hospitals, requesting the number of ward and private deliveries and therapeutic abortions performed on their services during any recent year or years. Useful information was received from the 60 hospitals listed in Table VI. As indicated by this table, 45 of the hospitals have both ward and private services, ten have ward services only, and five have private services only.

Among the 45 hospitals with both ward and private services, the incidence of therapeutic abortions was higher on the private services in 36; there were no ward or private abortions performed at five other hospitals, which reported 7,869 ward and 1,759 private deliveries; and the incidence of abortions was higher on the ward services of four hospitals which collectively performed only 8 abortions during the years chosen for review. No therapeutic abortions were done on 23 of the 55 ward and 9 of the 50 private services.

There is, of course, some statistical inaccuracy involved in appraising the combined incidence of therapeutic abortions at these various hospitals, for neither the size, the composition, nor the duration of the individual series is constant. It is nevertheless not without significance that the over-all frequency of therapeutic abortions at 60 outstanding American hospitals is 3.6 times higher on their private services than on their ward services. This is consistent with the New York City data presented in Table VII.

Comment.

The ward-private ratio of therapeutic abortions. The incidence of therapeutic abortions is strikingly higher on the private services than on the ward services. This has been observed before.[2-6] How can it be explained?

Part of the explanation lies in the dual tendency of the ward patients to register for antepartum care later in their pregnancies and to be less aware of their need to be aborted. That even this obstacle to ward-private equality can be overcome has been shown at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, where the abortion rates for the two services between 1952 and 1955 were virtually identical.[7]

Another part of this discrepancy may be attributed to the higher incidence of abortions for psychiatric indications among private patients. Whereas at Sloane Hospital one therapeutic abortion was performed for psychiatric reasons per 1,149 deliveries on the ward service, the comparable ratio for the private service was one per 104. Psychotherapy is known to have been given to 19 of 22 ward patients (86 per cent) and only 69 of 118 private patients (57 per cent) who had abortions for psychiatric reasons. It would appear therefore that private patients with unwanted pregnancies are more often referred for primary psychiatric evaluation and/or that psychiatric justification for abortion is more easily obtained for private patients.

But this is far from the complete explanation. As can be seen from Table II, abortions were more common among the private patients at Sloane Hospital for virtually all of the more debatable indications, such as arthritis, inactive tuberculosis, and rubella, and more common among the ward patients for most of the less debatable indications, such as rheumatic heart disease and hypertensive cardiovascular disease. Although comparably detailed information was not solicited from the 60 other hospitals, their participation in this trend is implied by their similar ward-private abortion ratios.

Further evidence of the greater liberality in the private abortion practice lies, of course, in the fact that at Sloane Hospital sterilizations accompanied abortions more than twice as often on the ward service whether the indication was psychiatric or medical.

The legality of therapeutic abortions. Today the life of the mother is almost never jeopardized by pregnancy, but the mental and physical health of the mother and the proper development of the fetus are not infrequently so jeopardized. Abortion is legally sanctioned by most states only if the former threat exists; yet abortion is medically approved and performed when the latter threats exist. The laws should be clarified to permit the indications for abortion which accepted medical practice has already legitimized.

The American Law Institute unanimously approved of a plan to liberalize our abortion laws 5 years ago. Nothing has been done to transform this proposal into legislation because no group has sought this action. Since it is the obstetricians who violate these laws, it is they, perhaps through their national societies, who should seek their renovation.

II. Sterilization

The sterilizations performed at Sloane Hospital were reviewed for the decade between Jan. 1, 1951, and Dec. 31, 1960. These procedures consisted of bilateral tubal ligations and cesarean hysterectomies. No attempt was made to determine which oophorectomies, salpingectomies, hysterectomies, or radiation castrations were performed for the primary purpose of sterilization, but this practice is uncommon at this hospital.

Incidence. The incidence of bilateral tubal ligations following vaginal deliveries of viable infants was as follows:

B. No. of vaginal deliveries	24,406	12,120	36,526

The incidence of sterilizations in association with cesarean sections was as follows:

In addition to the postpartum sterilizations there were the following:

	Ward	Private	Total
G. Bilateral tubal ligations following spontaneous abortions	9	6	15
H. Bilateral tubal ligations at laparotomy for ectopic pregnancies	2	0	2
I. Bilateral tubal ligations with therapeutic abortions	62	51	113
J. Interval tubal ligations	59	39	98

The yearly incidence of sterilizations between 1951 and 1960 remained remarkably constant for all of the above categories except for the interval sterilizations on the ward service, 66 per cent of which were performed during the last three years of the study period.

Since the subjects of postpartum and interval sterilizations are slightly different, they will be discussed separately.

Puerperal sterilizations.

Case material. The following data pertain to the patients in Categories A and G above. The cases of sterilization associated with cesarean sections were not analyzed in detail.

Two hundred and forty-two of the ward patients were Negro, one was Oriental, and 230 were Caucasian. This Caucasian:Negro ratio of 0.95:1 is considerably lower than the 1.4:1 ratio for the entire ward obstetrical service. Of the private patients, three were Negro and 140 Caucasian.

Excluding the Negroes and Puerto Ricans, 69 per cent of the 163 remaining ward patients and 25 per cent of the remaining 138 private patients were Catholic.

The average age of the ward patients was 32.2 years; of the private patients, 33.7. Thirty-one per cent of the ward patients were under the age of 30, as opposed to 14 per cent of the private patients.

*Indications. For the purpose of analytic simplification, the indications for postpartum

*Generally speaking, postpartum sterilization is permissible at Sloane Hospital for medical indications, repeat cesarean sections, and parity in excess of four.[5] and postabortal sterilizations were grouped into the four categories shown in Table VIII. The relative frequency of these various categories is outlined in Table IX. Fifty-four per cent of the private cases and 6 per cent of the ward cases fell into Category 1 (slight medical disease) or Category 4 (no medical disease, parity less than 5). Moreover, the parity of the private patients in Categories 1 and 4 was three or less in 49 per cent (25 patients were para iii, 13 were para ii, one was para i), whereas the parity of the ward patients was three (never less) in only 13 per cent (6 patients).

Parity. The average parity of the ward patients was 6.1, and of the private patients 3.8.

Experience at other hospitals. Of the 65 hospitals in the survey, useful information about postpartum sterilizations was received from the 53 listed in Table X. Since it was unclear from some of the replies whether sterilizations at the time of cesarean sections and abortions were included among the data submitted, it is probably reasonable to assume that the actual incidence of postpartum sterilization is slightly higher than that shown by this table. Although the range from one sterilization per eleven deliveries to one per 467 deliveries on the ward services and from 1:10 to 1:483 on the private services is wide, the over-all minimum average incidence of 2.5 per cent (10,075 sterilizations among 409,374 deliveries, including the Sloane Hospital figures) is probably fairly accurate.

The ward and private rates in this series (including the Sloane Hospital figures) were 2.4 per cent and 2.2 per cent respectively. A similar survey by Starr and Kolasky[9] of 5,673 puerperal sterilizations among 177,433 live births revealed a ward rate of 3.0 per cent and a private rate of 3.3 per cent. These sets of incidence figures are generally in keeping with those reported elsewhere.[10-14]

Comment.

1. The ward-private ratio of puerperal sterilizations. The fact that the ward and private sterilization rates are virtually identical is deceptive, for it suggests the incorrect conclusion that ward and private patients are sterilized in accordance with similar standards. That a double standard does actually pertain to the practice of sterilization as well as abortion is indicated in part by the fact that the average parity of the ward and private patients sterilized at Sloane Hospital was 6.1 and 3.8, respectively, and the medical indications for these sterilizations were debatable in 54 per cent of the private cases and only 6 per cent of the ward cases. There is no reason to believe that similar disparities do not prevail at other hospitals.

2. The legality of sterilizations. There are two states (Virginia and North Carolina) which have recently enacted laws permitting sterilization for any reason considered sufficient by two physicians and specifically protecting these doctors from legal redress. These laws are not ideal. In the first place they require a thirty-day waiting period between patient permission and medical action, thus rendering postpartum sterilization practically impossible for the late antepartum registrant. Secondly, they require hospitalization of the patient, thus complicating the simple office procedure of vasectomy. Thirdly, and perhaps worst of all, the very existence of these laws in two states has led many of the physicians in the other 48 states to fear that they should be similarly protected in order to perform a sterilizing procedure.

What is the need for such laws? There is no legal precedent to support the physician's fear that freely requested and medically sanctioned sterilization procedures are forensically indefensible. As a matter of fact, in the only sterilization case ever tried on medical grounds in a United States' court it was held that [even] vasectomy does not constitute mayhem."[19]

Once again, since this is primarily an obstetrical issue, it should be resolved by obstetricians. With or without the formality of legislation, some representative body of obstetricians should establish an acceptable code of sterilization ethics.

Interval sterilizations.

Incidence. At Sloane Hospital during the years of 1951 through 1960 there were 59 interval sterilizations on the ward service and 39 on the private service. One such procedure was performed for every 448 ward deliveries and for every 351 private deliveries. This ratio is of course less meaningful for this particular type of operation, but it is the only parameter available by which the frequency of this practice can be measured.

Case material. Forty-five of the 59 ward patients were Caucasian, 13 were Negro, and one was Oriental. All of the 39 private patients in this group were Caucasian.

Excluding the Negroes and Puerto Ricans, 75 per cent of the 24 remaining ward patients and 21 per cent of the 39 private patients were Catholic.

Fifty-three (90 per cent) of the ward patients lived in New York City; the remaining 6 lived elsewhere in New York State. Twelve (31 per cent) of the private patients lived in New York City, 11 elsewhere in New York State, and 16 in some other state.

The average age of the ward patients was 33.2 and of the private patients 34.0 years.

The average parity of the ward patients was 4.3, of the private patients 3.0.

Type of surgery. All of the sterilizations in this group were accomplished by bilateral tubal ligation. The approach to the tubes (whether abdominal or vaginal) and the nature of coincidental surgery (abdominal or vaginal), if any, are given in Table XI.

Indications. The various indications for which these sterilizations were done is shown in Table XII and the relative frequency of these five categories in Table XIII. Forty-nine per cent of the private cases and 8 per cent of the ward cases fell into Category 1 (slight medical disease) or Category 4 (no medical disease, parity less than 5).

Experience at other hospitals. Accurate data on the practice of interval sterilizations are difficult to obtain. The survey of 65 hospitals yielded the following: 34 hospitals reported 647 ward interval sterilizations and 102,849 ward deliveries, a ratio of 1:159; and 27 hospitals reported 595 private interval sterilizations and 126,674 private deliveries, a ratio of 1:213.

Comment. It is generally believed that tubal ligations should be performed almost exclusively in the puerperium. Hence, only 7 per cent of the sterilizations in the Sloane Hospital series were done on an interval basis, 35 per cent of these were done in conjunction with a colporrhaphy, and 21 per cent were done within 6 months of delivery. This belief needs reappraisal. Why should a patient be denied sterilization just because her youngest child is 2 years instead of 2 days old?

III. Contraception

Precise information with regard to the number of Sloane Hospital private and ward patients who have obtained contraceptive advice is unavailable. One approximate fact is known: about 275 new ward patients were seen in the contraceptive clinic every year between 1951 and 1960 and, hence, about 2,750 during the decade. Since there were 29,286 ward deliveries during these years, approximately 9.4 per cent of the ward patients received contraceptive advice. On the other hand, a poll of the attending physicians reveals that contraceptive advice was made available to all of the private patients who wanted it.

Experience at other hospitals. Precise data on the availability of contraceptive advice were also impossible to obtain from the 65 hospitals surveyed. The approximate calculations submitted from the ward services of 55 hospitals are shown in Table XIV. Of the 37 hospitals which estimated the incidence of giving contraceptive advice to their ward patients, 13 reported no contraceptive service, 19 reported an estimate of less than 50 per cent, and five an estimate of more than 50 per cent. Yet it must be safe to assume that contraceptive advice was available to virtually all of the private patients who wanted it.

Comment. The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists has already officially approved the principle of providing contraception to all who desire it. It now devolves upon the obstetricians of this country to convert this principle into fact.

Conclusion

The institution and implementation of birth control measures are primarily medical matters. The obstetrician's obligation to provide abortion, sterilization, and contraception is inadequately and inequitably met at the moment. The obstetricians of America must individually and collectively review these vital issues in an effort to establish a more uniformly humane birth control ethic.

A heterogeneous group of pregnant women petitioned for abortion because of possible impairment of mental and/or physical health; 43 of 50 were followed for 3 to 6 months. Ambivalence and guilt appeared more substantially in young women under 18 years of age. Three to 6 months afterward, 29 patients expressed a positive reaction toward abortion, 10 reported no significant change in their life situations and 4 responded negatively. Of the 41 patients remaining fertile, 4 had purposely become pregnant again; 8 others were apparently without consistent contraception. It was concluded that preabortion counseling should outline the necessary steps for Committee consideration, give reassurance as to physical safety, and help the patient understand her motives and goals. Postabortion follow-up should emphasize a clear contraceptive program.

INDUCED ABORTION has become a major method of birth control in many parts of the world. Throughout the United States in the past 3 years, there have been significant modifications of a number of restrictive state abortion laws. Sloane's[1] recent review summarizes the current medical and social dilemma over this problem and concludes that psychiatric labels often mask humanitarian reasons for abortions.

After the 1967 abortion law revision in California, there was a rapid evolution in this field. With the ensuing increase in legal abortions, it became possible to study prospectively a heterogeneous group of women who desired abortions for a variety of reasons. This is a preliminary report on the follow-up of such a study group.

Patients and procedures

From November 1, 1967, to June 30, 1968, 55 women applied to the staff of the Obstetrical Service of the University of California–San Francisco for termination of pregnancy because of its possible significant impairment of their mental or physical health. The screening procedures used in this study included: (1) a self-administered questionnaire* at the time of initial application for abortion, which provided demographic data and pertinent information; (2) a Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (MMPI) profile prior to abortion and again 3 to 6 months later (this test was omitted when cultural or linguistic factors obviated its use); (3) a psychiatric evaluation of the degree of psychiatric illness and/or possible effects of pregnancy on the patient's mental health; (4) a semistructured interview* by a social worker (adapted from Simon and associates[2]) 3 to 6 months after the abortion to assess the postabortal responses and psychosocial situation.

The abortion techniques included dilatation and curettage in early weeks of pregnancy (in 2 women), aspiration (in 29), hypertonic injection (in 9), and hysterotomy (in 1). At the patients' own request, tubal ligation was also done in 4 who had aspiration abortion, in one with hypertonic injection, and in one with hysterotomy; 3 also had hysterectomies.

Results

The Therapeutic Abortion Committee (Table I) accepted 51 of the 55 women who applied, one of whom subsequently elected to carry her pregnancy to term. Three were rejected on the basis of insufficient evidence to substantiate impairment of mental health and obtained abortions elsewhere. A fourth patient, who was rejected because abortion seemed psychiatrically contraindicated, was delivered of twins at term and had a tubal ligation.

Information accrued (Table II) from the self-administered questionnaire showed a wide age range—from 13 to 44 years, with 46 per cent of patients falling between 21 and 26 years. Thirty-six were in the first trimester at the time of abortion, despite the 10 to 14 day preabortion procedures. The psychiatric evaluations at the time of approval included 15 with a situational reaction, 14 with neurosis, 10 with character disorders, 6 who had a major psychotic illness concurrent with the pregnancy or in the immediate past, and 6 who had no obvious psychiatric problems.

Four to 6 months after abortion, the follow-up interview on 43 patients indicated that 22 had positive psychological changes, demonstrated by growth experience, increased empathy, increased sense of freedom, and greater sense of femininity. Seven reported other positive changes, such as less fear of pregnancy assured by sterilization or knowledge of better birth control methods, and improved marital or family relations. Four had negative reactions, such as guilt or fear of men, and 10 indicated no change in attitude.

The patients' principal fears of abortion were concerned with the possibility of injury as a result of the abortion technique (in 21 women), its effect on mental or physical health (in 6), retaliation by others or by one's own conscience (in 5), feelings about destroying living tissue (in 3), and Committee rejection (for 2). In the postabortion follow-up, 36 expressed negative reactions centered around the ignorance of the procedural technicalities (in 12), the time required for processing (in 13), and some apparently embarrassing personal encounters during the experience (in 11). The 25 positive responses indicated good supportive help from various staff members. The principal suggestion by the patients was a request for more available public information and less complex application requirements.

Of the 41 aborted women who were not sterilized, 4 became pregnant again (Table III). In each case the pregnancy was consciously sought for a variety of reasons. In 2, the abortion was a regretful experience, while in the other 2 the abortion seemed to have allowed more stable life situations to become manifest. In addition to the 16 year old, who was pregnant again, a 13 year old and a 14 year old also regretted their preabortion decisions; all three felt very guilty and believed they had injured a living being.

The mean preabortion MMPI showed abnormal elevations on the scales depicting depression, psychopathic deviation, and schizophrenia. A study of 36 paired pre- and post-abortion profiles showed that 15 of the 27 initially abnormal tests became essentially normal after abortion. This was a significant change ($P < 0.002$) by a test for correlated proportions.

In response to several questions designed to detect mixtures of feelings, 17 of those responding reported some guilt, and 20 had some ambivalence. Nevertheless, in a direct query as to whether they would repeat the abortion under similar circumstances, 37 said they would, 6 were unsure, and 2 would have refused.

In contrast to the generally poor pre-abortion contraceptive practices, 25 patients were taking oral birth control pills 3 to 6 months after abortion. Two patients were satisfied with IUD's, and one patient used a diaphragm, and one used a condom. Six patients refused birth control advice, and 6 patients did not return for a postabortal doctor visit.

After therapeutic abortion, 3 patients initiated psychotherapy, and 11 continued psychiatric care, while 6 had short-term, problem-directed interviews with a psychiatrist or social worker. Twenty-three women had no sociopsychiatric follow-up observation beyond the tests made to complete this study.

Comment

Our data corroborate 4 recent studies of therapeutic abortion patients in the United States (Table IV), which show that terminations of pregnancy do not tend to aggravate mental illness and are often helpful to the life situation adjustment of these patients. The legal, social, and medical sanction for interruption of pregnancy results in minimizing untoward guilt and depressive reactions, leaving the great majority of women with a sense of rightness of their pregnancy terminations, now culturally approved.

Of particular concern to us, however, are the pregnant girls under 18. Although our study group was small, we encountered a great deal of ambivalence and guilt. As a result, we feel that especially careful evaluation and counseling should be provided for them and their families. The alternative of a teen-ager carrying a pregnancy to term presents great difficulties for the teen-ager and her child, and the delicate balancing of risks often requires the most expert collaborative effort of physician, psychiatrist, and social worker.

A large number of patients used oral contraceptives regularly after abortion; however, 8 women were apparently without satisfactory birth control advice 3 to 6 months afterward. Although they were not pregnant, they constitute a significant group of potential repeaters. It is mandatory that a therapeutic abortion unit place a high priority on understanding the patient's attitude toward birth control and help her to choose a method which she will use regularly.

The things that concerned our patients most about abortion were ignorance of what to expect in the preliminary screening process and fear of the physical danger of the surgical procedure. Both of these areas should be emphasized in the preabortion counseling, as well as the fact that few requests for therapeutic termination are denied. Concerns over time schedule or anonynity can quickly be dispelled. The conflicting feelings arising from conscience or fear of family repercussions can be pinpointed for more intensive follow-up.

As a result of our study, we have tried to shorten the time between patient application, Committee decision, and abortion, as well as to minimize cost and provide efficient, effective care by come-and-go abortion procedures in the first trimester. At present, the time interval from first contact to abortion ranges from 36 hours to 2 weeks.

Since California law and others modeled on American Law Institute recommendations do not specify that a psychiatrist must attest to the degree of mental health impairment of the patient, we have encouraged the patient's physician to make that assessment. If a psychological problem is unresolved, or if the patient is grossly disturbed, a psychiatric consultation is obviously important. However, an interested and concerned obstetrician can usually make the necessary observations to permit a final judgment by the Committee. Currently, a formal psychiatric consultation is presented to the Committee in 10 per cent of the staff cases and in 20 per cent of the private cases.

For many women, therapeutic abortion will become an increasingly frequent alternate to a stressful pregnancy. An estimated 60,000 abortions will have been done in California during 1970. Such a procedure must continue to be carefully scrutinized so that it will be associated with minimal hazards and maximum efficiency and effectiveness.

Discussion

Dr. JOHN C. MCDONNOTT, San Mateo, California. Dr. Margolis, along with many others, recognizes that abortion is not a simple matter and that problems other than morbidity and deaths are involved. He has attempted a prospective study for which he should be commended but to believe that observations over the 6 month postabortal period are of much importance is to give them more weight than they deserve. While anecdotal discussion is derogated by our scientific colleagues, my thoughts go back to the time I started private practice in 1936. During the great depression, abortions were as popular as they are today. At that time, most abortions were done by experts, since staying out of San Quentin was a strong incentive. They were also done early, a factor favoring a good outcome. As the depression receded, the number of infertility patients was high. Careful study disclosed a history of induced abortion in many. Among these persons, the feeling of guilt was great, and they were difficult to handle. Fortunately in most cases the blocked tubes opened up 6 to 8 years post abortion, and pregnancies ensued to the point where the problem was one of the opposite sort.

As chairman of the abortion committee from the time the California abortion law was changed to the present time, I have been forced to learn about a whole group of persons whose values differ from mine in almost all respects. These values do not stem from tradition but seem to represent those in the nonthinkers who dominate the news media. Samples of this thinking are: "If you feel like doing something, do it. Don't take a chance on injuring your psyche by any sexual repression. If anyone warns you of dangers in your course of action, ignore him because he represents the "straight" generation. Don't use birth control pills, they're dangerous. Do have an abortion, it's simple, quick, and safe." I could go on with samples of cliches promoted by news media—unfortunately supported by enthusiasts in our profession who think any means should be used to promote their goals. Persons with these attitudes by and large form the group requesting abortions at our hospital. Now, the question arises, should we go along with these misconceptions so that the patient will regard the abortion as an exciting episode in her young life and become an authoritative dispenser of misinformation to her friends.

The complete lack of correct information appears to me to be the biggest problem to be solved relative to abortions. This we attempt to correct among our abortion applicants. Each case is considered individually. Trained social workers spend much time trying to work out problems bearing on the patient's decision. All community resources are brought to her attention. Pressure from the husband, boy friend, or parent is determined and discussed, and, in some instances with extensive discussion, other solutions than abortion are selected. The true facts with regard to abortion dangers and sequelae are presented, so that a truly knowledgeable decision can be made. After abortion, we have "rap" sessions where an effort is made to present to the patient the effect of life style on health, both mental and physical.

Without scientific knowledge to tell us the real end result of abortions, we reason the extensive individual effort will help to diminish the adverse results. The current efforts to streamline the process and make only formal compliance with legal requirements brings me to the observation made by my social worker, that ultimate efficiency will have as its result the barren goal of nothingness.

Dr. EUGENE C. SANDBERG, Palo Alto, California. It is interesting to note the similarity in figures emanating from different areas. The recurrence rate of undesired pregnancies in Dr. Margolis' series was ten per cent. Two years ago, Dr. Von der Ahe[1] mentioned in a report to this Society that the recurrence rate for illegitimate (and presumably undesired) pregnancies was nine per cent among the patients at 4 Los Angeles facilities for unwed pregnant women. At Stanford University Hospital during the past three years, we have also noticed that five to ten per cent of patients requesting therapeutic abortions have had prior undesired pregnancies.

Similarity in figures is also noticeable regarding subsequent utilization of contraception. Two years ago Tyler and associates[2] studied a group of women who had been admitted to Grady Memorial Hospital in Atlanta with or for an induced abortion. Upon dismissal, only seventy-five per cent accepted contraception. In Dr. Margolis' group, the figure was essentially the same. This seems to be a very low rate of acceptance of contraception for a group of women who have just procured an abortion.

Last, I think it would be foolhardy for anyone to believe that pregnancy will be prevented on a long-term basis, even in the group accepting contraception. It is well known that the two-year dropout rate is approximately fifty per cent for essentially each of the contraceptive methods. Additionally, in Tyler's study, twenty-two per cent of the patients admitted with or for an induced abortion had previously attended the Grady Memorial Hospital Family Planning Clinic. Obviously, something didn't take. And their experience is not unique.

DR. J. OPPIE MCCALL, Portland, Oregon. Opponents and proponents of therapeutic abortion seem to take an exquisite delight out of presentations such as Dr. Margolis has given us. We seem to take delight on whichever side of the fence we are on as to some prospective analysis of the individual after the fact. Did she think it was a good idea? We have here, of course, an extremely small number of patients but even with a large number of patients we have an extremely varied group to try to analyze, anywhere from the 12 year old to the 45 year old, married and unmarried, etc. I find it difficult to even achieve any semblance of order out of trying to see how this patient regarded her abortion after it was done. However, let me fall into the same trap of wanting to compare how she feels before and after and ask Dr. Margolis a question which all these studies so far have failed to bring out. That is, regardless of age, marital status, etc., have the psychiatrist and the psychologist interpreted what the effect was of the early-trimester abortion as opposed to the mid-trimester abortion. My own observation is that I fear the girl with a second-trimester abortion is going to have a much more violent reaction to her abortion.

DR. MARGOLIS (Closing). I appreciate Dr. McDermott's observations based on his long practice of our specialty. Some of our abortion patients have patterns of sexual behavior which some might consider promiscuous; however, our incidence of positive preabortion gonorrhea cultures is one per cent whereas it is 3 to 4 per cent in our antenatal group.

With regard to Dr. McCall's observation, I agree that a second-trimester abortion is technically significantly different from first-trimester abortion. I think also that a candidate for abortion in the second trimester is a different patient than a candidate for abortion in the first trimester. Knowledge of abortion may not have been easily available to her, or more important she might have a marked degree of ambivalence that would aggravate any reaction to abortion.

PSYCHOLOGIC AND EMOTIONAL CONSEQUENCES OF ELECTIVE ABORTION

A Review

GEORGE S. WALTER, MD, MPH, FACOG

Should we consider abortion as temerity or therapy? Tradition impugns to the aborted woman a burden of guilt and social stigma. However, scrutiny of available literature suggests that there is really no documentation for significant psychiatric sequelae. The review suggests certain inadequacies of reported studies and underscores the need for carefully controlled, long-term, prospective observation of the woman seeking abortion, and of her family.

Unto the woman He said:
I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception;
In sorrow thou shalt bring forth children,
And thy desire shall be to thy husband,
And he shall rule over thee.

Genesis 3:16

THE DAUGHTERS OF EVE, long laboring under the burden of this terrible curse, are beginning to stir. Who, but they, can rightly divine the moment when their full creative powers should bloom? A voice is heard!

But, it was not always so. The ancient Assyrians decreed that she be impaled upon a stake and not dignified by burial should she exercise her own judgment. The fanfare that was Greece and Rome winked at, yea welcomed, both abortion and infanticide, and yet allowed the ascetic Pythagoreans to, once again, deprive each woman of her birthright. The debate has continued through the centuries, with the cudgel of church and civil law on the one side, and necessity on the other,[80,121,128] while in between, male philosophers tendentiously argue at what metaphysical point of time life begins after the chance collision of an aggressive motile cell with the wall of one that is less so.[4,82]

But woman has been adamant in her self-determination, and by whatever means fell to her knowledge or power, has attempted to control her fertility. The vacillating pendulum of public practice has swung toward a more liberal approach to induced abortion in recent years, till we have more abortions than births in Hungary,[37,102] and 1 out of every 8 Japanese doctors may be an abortionist.[117] And yet, we hear that in certain groups in the United States, 94% of pregnancies are unwanted!"[48] Confusion is no more rampant anywhere than in the professional arena, where we hear such cries as, "There are no nonmedical indications for abortion!" and "Teach chastity!"[40] The New Jersey Supreme Court has ruled that, "The unborn child would almost certainly choose life with defects as against no life at all."[37] Even such a prominent and usually progressive authority as Mary Calderone clouds the issue by saying, "Aside from the fact that abortion is the taking of a life, I am also mindful of what was brought out by our psychiatrists—that in almost every case, abortion, whether legal or illegal, is a traumatic experience that may have severe consequences later on."[39]

But, is this necessarily so? The purpose of this discussion will be to examine the woman who is faced with a pregnancy, to see upon what she bases her reaction to it, to consider with her the possible alternatives, and then to see what psychoemotional phenomena have been demonstrated by experience with women who have exercised their right not to bear a child.

A WOMAN LOOKS AT MOTHERHOOD

A woman will function appropriately and effectively as a mother if:

She achieves, besides language mastery, a level of abstract thought sufficient to see herself apart from others;

She esteems this concept of herself and finds it reliable;

Her actual self usually approximates this well-regarded image of herself;

She perceives the struggle out of which her identity evolved; and

She genuinely wants to be a mother.[109] She is expected to go through the progression of accepting her pregnancy (after an 85% initial rejection in primagravidas), developing an affiliative response to the fetus, and then assigning a reality-based identity to the newborn.[25] Fortunate indeed, are the majority of women who blissfully accomplish this metamorphosis from woman to mother.

If she is significantly maladapted in any one of these areas, then she may be one of the 3 to 13 women, per 1000 live births, who develops a significant puerperal psychologic illness.[13,20,69,88,100] The risk to her of recurrent episodes may increase tremendously with subsequent pregnancies.[72-74,119,124,161] So powerful is this emotional condition that illness has even been found in mothers after the adoption of children.[108] Indeed, her progression to emotional motherhood may be arrested, and the pregnancy will end. It has been postulated that the psyche might play a role in spontaneous abortion,[91,99] and most certainly does in habitual abortion; patients forced into motherhood and femininity by a successful Shirodkar procedure have had acute psychiatric disturbances.[133] This, then, is the powerful and overwhelming set of forces, some conscious, many others unconscious, focusing on the woman who contemplates bearing a child.

THE ALTERNATIVES TO CHILDBEARING

A woman may go ahead and bear her child, either adjusting reasonably well in the process, or rejecting the infant, although more will be said later about the child.[5,68]

She may threaten to procure, or even attempt, an illegal abortion,[47,65,169] particularly if she has been abandoned by her partner, and has hysterical traits.[4] She may actually obtain an illegal abortion, with its inherent dangers.[10,82,99,121] Interestingly enough, relaxation of abortion laws has not always led to a reduction of illegal abortions as was anticipated.[36,71,186]

She may threaten suicide, and in spite of suggestions to the contrary,[4,21-23,65,109,134] pregnant women do commit suicide, both before[16,21,122,158] and after termination of pregnancy.[142-148]

Whatever the patient's motivations or make-up, threats, whether toward abortion or suicide, should be considered seriously and interpreted as signs of mental insufficiency and an inability to cope. This woman's behavior becomes an unpredictable entity.[4,188] Extensive studies of women who develop puerperal depression show that their personality make-up is such that their strong "mother-compliance" makes them very good patients and hard to recognize as women with great potential for acting-out behavior, either against themselves or the child.[84]

A woman's last alternative, available today only in certain privileged geographic and social circumstances, would be to seek a legal abortion. Let us digress slightly at this point to develop a train of logic which will set the stage for a consideration of the emotional sequelae of legal abortion.

We are told that neurotic women tend to have more pregnancies, abortions (all types), stillbirths, neonatal deaths, and psychiatric illness in their children.[99] We also know that there is a high degree of correlation between the prepregnancy state of mental health and the likelihood of puerperal illness.[4,35,39,41–43,70,94–96,109,113–115,120–127,156,188] Women with an earlier spontaneous abortion show significantly more psychiatric symptoms than others during subsequent pregnancies,[56] and some women have a "postabortion hangover" lasting until the projected term of the aborted pregnancy.[113] Mental illnesses associated with reproductive function account for 2–8% of all female psychiatric admissions,[39,69,109] with significant numbers of deaths,[7] and full recovery in only around 85%.[124]

If one of every five American pregnancies ends in abortion for some reason,[87] and if the incidence of mental insufficiency is higher after legal abortions,[97] and if some cognitive dissonance must be necessary to allow a woman to contemplate willful abortion, would it not be reasonable to expect a significant amount of mental illness after induced abortion?

EXPERIENCES WITH INDUCED ABORTION

There is a growing body of literature, much of it from northwestern Europe, and more recently from investigators in England and America, which discusses the psychiatric sequelae of induced abortion for nonmedical indications.[4,14,21,26,41–43,49,51,56,57,73,77,84,96–97,99–103,108,202,206,110,113–114,120,126–130,136,158] It is beyond the scope of this particular discussion to repeat the details of individual studies.

While there is some variation in their numbers and the quality of sampling and controls, if one removes the overlay of emotional, sentimental, and technical pejoratives, there is an amazingly consistent finding: legal abortion can be performed without fear of severe psychic harm to the woman. The reaction to abortion is determined almost entirely by a woman's previous psychologic set. Her feelings may fall into one of the following categories:

Guilt

Reported incidences varied from none at all to as high as 30%, with none severe. A critical factor in mild, immediate guilt is the actual physical setup of the clinical situation and the attitude of people caring for the patient. As time passed after the abortion, the degree of guilt decreased, until by one year, there was almost no guilt. What little did remain was frequently due to failure of the woman's manipulative effort, and was disguised as self-anger at the inability to structure a relationship or situation. True depression was rare, and suicide was almost absent from the data. The phenomenon of the so-called "atonement pregnancy," to make up for the one aborted, was noted in some studies, but has not been sufficiently investigated. While there was some concern about manifestations of delayed guilt, with possible involutional depression, none of the studies has progressed long enough to evaluate this yet.

Impaired Development of Adult Stages of Personality

This was found only if the woman proved sterile following the abortion, and this incidence was not greater than for normal pregnancy.[149,153,154] If she had a previous personality defect or frank illness, it might actually improve or remain essentially unchanged.

Disturbance of Relationship with the Opposite Sex

A woman might project her own childish or neurotic emotions upon her spouse and appease her own guilt by blaming it on him. This was particularly true if she had been pressured into the abortion by the man. The Kinsey group [49] went beyond mere figures showing patient satisfaction to evaluate a woman's subsequent performance in three areas. They found that 90% of postabortal unmarried women resumed premarital coitus, suggesting little psychic damage. Premarital abortion did not affect adversely the sexual adjustment in marriage as measured by the rate of orgasm during the first year of marital intercourse. And the incidence of marital break-up was actually lower in women who had had a premarital induced abortion. While one might argue with their criteria for measuring ill-effect, it does appear that their subjects' function was not interferred with.

When all the data are considered, we can probably say that legal abortion leaves its mark, just as does every other important event in a person's life. It is an unnatural way of solving conflict involved in an unwanted pregnancy. Women who are psychically vulnerable risk a deterioration in their condition through an unwelcome pregnancy and the extra load this involves, whatever course is adopted. Those who are mentally stable manage the pregnancy better. Those who come to therapeutic abortion are already highly selected in terms of their psychopathology. We must remember, therefore, in considering the rare unfavorable outcome that the pregnancy was a symptom of, rather than the cause of, the emotional disturbance, and that abortion was only a method of treating the symptom. Abortion may have no effect, or it may actually stabilize the underlying process.

Further Considerations of Effects of Abortion

We must think of any woman seeking abortion, even an unmarried one, as occupying a place in a social unit of interrelationships. In considering this unit, the most immediately apparent member is the sexual partner of the woman. A search of the literature reveals that there is really very little written about this important element of her psychologic field. Studies of women with puerperal emotional difficulties suggest that their husbands are frequently repeated images of their own rather weak and colorless fathers, and that the women feel victimized by and martyred to these ineffective men, whom they dominate. There is frequently a basic and covert sexual and procreative conflict which is unresolved as well. It is also known that women seeking abortion may do so at the insistence of partners whose neurotic behavior is being acted out upon their wives. The meaning of these relationships as well as of the induced abortion itself to the male is not clear.

Ekblad[41] reports that among the husbands of 479 women aborted upon psychiatric indications, 32% were neurotic, 14% more were alcoholic or criminal or both and 10% had somatic diseases. Hook reported similar patterns in 20% of partners of women who were refused abortion and 46% of partners of those granted abortion, suggesting once again that the request for abortion may have arisen from a mutual psychoemotional illness. The Kinsey group studies[49] report that following the abortion itself, only 4.2% of the male partners had psychiatric consequences attributable to the abortion. This scanty data serves only to underline the importance of the man and the absence of any real body of information about his role.

Again, observing the woman as part of a biologic unit, we must ask about the effect of abortion upon children in that unit. Women seeking abortion on psychiatric grounds have been shown to have an immature emotional involvement with previous children.[109] Studies of puerperal illnesses suggest that when a mother has difficulty, it is not only a sick patient, but also a sick relationship between mother and child.[93] We also know that women with previous disturbances are the most likely to have repetitive episodes of disturbance when faced with [illegible] again, and that this disturbance [illegible] either lead a woman to request abortion or result in infanticide as often as once or twice in 500 births.[7,116] If abortion is selected as a solution to the immediate problem of an unwanted pregnancy, older children in the same family may misinterpret the act as a great threat and require psychiatric treatment.[109] From observing a group of 87 children whose mothers had aborted (type not specified), Cain reported two types of reactions: an immediate type, characterized by anxiety attacks, nightmares, increased aggressiveness, stuttering, running away, death phobias, increased separation anxiety, sudden outbursts of fear or hatred of the mother, and even suicide attempts; and a late type ranging from isolated fantasies to pervading, crucial, and disabling illness. He feels that the children's reactions are not predictable, but will be influenced by the degree of their knowledge of the abortion and their parent's attitude toward it and toward them. A very revealing retrospective study by Forssman and Thuwe followed 134 children born to 128 women who were refused abortion. Only 120 survived to 21 years. Seven and one-half percent were abandoned. They compared them to a self-selected control group of wanted children, and found that the "failed abortion" children had more family instability, more antisocial and criminal behavior, more drunken conduct, more military exemptions, less education, and needed more public assistance and psychiatric care. More of the girls in the unwanted group married early and had children early. Hook found in children under 12, born to mothers after abortion was refused them, an incidence of 22% disorders of behavior in the first 4 years of school, compared to 20% in the control group. There has not been adequate study of children, but we can conclude that the very fact that a woman applies for a legal abortion means that the prospective child risks having to surmount greater social and mental handicaps than his peers, even when the grounds for the application are so slight that it is refused. Legislation on therapeutic termination of pregnancy must consider the social risk to which the expected child will be exposed.

CRITICISM OF STUDIES REVIEWED

When the contributions of all authors are read and compared, some rather consistent defects in the body of knowledge and the methods used to obtain it are found.

Sampling methods are not uniform and not always good, so data may not be comparable. For example, psychiatric sequelae may be quite different in a cold, frightening, across-the-tracks type of abortion. Part of the guilt may actually be over money spent. A woman who has an abortion as the result of professional consultation shares the burden of decision. There is a high degree of self-selection in those seeking abortion. In the studies, there is no systematization of data gathering, and inadequate attempts are made to find those who do not return voluntarily. There may be a failure to standardize consideration of the patients by type of abortion—spontaneous, medically indicated, illegal or legal. The differentiation and relationship between pre- and post-abortal psychopathology are not always clear. The meaning of the aborted pregnancy as well as that of subsequent pregnancies is not always investigated. Many of the studies mix patients who have concomitant sterilization with those were only aborted, and the majority of them have not followed their patients long enough to rule out late sequelae. Some of the evaluations of puerperal psychiatric illnesses do not include abortal histories. Only rarely does a study consider such factors as age, parity and spacing of children as influences on guilt formation. Probably one of the most serious errors is the almost universal projection of figures and results from Scandanavia into expectations from other countries. The difference in sociocultural concepts of abortion may make this a significant sociologic error.

PROFESSIONAL ATTITUDES TOWARD ABORTION

One cannot review this much material without being struck by the fact that one of the largest deterrents to a liberalized abortion policy, in spite of the public clamor, is the health profession itself.[16,21,23–4,29,61,97,115,128,132,150] Abortion is foreign to the attitudes fostered in physicians during their medical training; the gynecologist, the one to do the abortion, has a basic psychologic conflict. A whole generation of professional health workers refuses to let the myth die out that abortion will irreparably harm a woman and somehow place a stigma upon her. Physicians remain adamant. The male physician won't let the woman decide—reminiscent of the moralistic attitude about pain relief in childbirth before Queen Victoria demanded it for herself. The pregnant woman symbolizes proof of male potency, and if the male loosens his rule over women and grants them the right to dispose of that proof when they want to, the men then feel terribly threatened lest women can, at will, rob them of their potency and masculinity. This flaunting of traditional subservience may be one of the more powerful and less conscious determinants of our irrational opposition to granting women the right to decide matters in this crucial area of their lives. It may also function in the frequent professional insistence upon sterilization as a "package deal" with abortion. In this way the male physician can maintain control.[97,156]

CONCLUSIONS

Consideration of the emotional stresses of parturition would suggest that induced abortion could be a traumatic and damaging episode in a woman's life. Extensive review of the literature reveals that this has not been true. In fact, for the healthy woman with a happy marriage, abortion is most often truly therapeutic. There is still inadequate evaluation of the meaning of abortion to the woman's sexual partner and her other children. Various previous studies do not cast doubt upon our conclusion about the relative psychiatric safety of abortion, but they do point out the pressing need for baseline studies on the prevalence of psychologic disabilities resulting from other outcomes of pregnancy—the birth of a normal child, a premature child, a retarded or otherwise abnormal child; a neonatal death or late spontaneous abortion; and the consequences of unwanted parenthood for mother, child, family and community. Professional attitudes have been indicted as one of the major deterrents in keeping abortion from its rightful place as a useful tool in helping a couple thoughtfully and carefully plan their family.

Abraham Lincoln advised us well when he said, "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. . . As our case is new, so must we think anew and act anew. . . We must disenthrall ourselves."

Therapeutic Abortion

Definitions. Therapeutic abortion is the termination of pregnancy before the period of fetal viability for the purpose of saving the life of the mother or safeguarding her health. Because concepts are changing rapidly, the definition of therapeutic abortion lacks precision. The word "health" in particular is variously interpreted. In its broadest sense, as defined by the World Health Organization, it applies not only to physical health but also to mental health and social well-being. Therapeutic abortion, unlike any other surgical operation, is governed by statute or common law in all states, but the wording of the regulations differs widely. In the strictest sense the law in most states does not permit the procedure for reasons such as illegitimacy, poverty, or rape, or on the basis that the infant is likely to be gravely malformed. Despite its apparent simplicity the law remains vague because the definitions of "life," "save," and "preserve" are subject to widely varying interpretation. For example, one English high court has acquitted a physician for performing therapeutic abortion in a case of rape of a young girl (Rex v. Bourne. For details see Harper). Abortions are commonly performed in cases of rubella, as a result of which the child may be malformed. In a time of rapidly changing laws, concepts, and mores, therapeutic abortion cannot be defined nor can the listing of its indications carry any degree of accuracy or permanence.

Legal Status. Contrary to popular belief today's stringent abortion laws are of fairly recent origin. Before quickening (the term applied to the first definite perception of fetal movement, which occurs between the sixteenth and twentieth weeks of gestation), abortion was either lawful or widely tolerated in both the United States and Great Britain until 1803. In that year, as part of a general overhaul of British criminal law, a basic criminal abortion law was enacted that made abortion before quickening illegal. Canon law, creating the dogma that in no circumstance is abortion justifiable, was established in 1869 by Pope Pius IX (Pilpel and Norwick).

The British law of 1803 became the model for similar laws in the United States, but it was not until 1821 that Connecticut enacted the nation's first abortion law. Throughout the nation abortion became illegal except to save the life of the mother. In a few states, the word "health" was added. Until very recently therapeutic abortion in most states was legally permissible only if it was necessary to save the life of the mother. Two states extended the exception to "to prevent serious or permanent bodily injury", and in another two, the exception read "to preserve the life or health of the woman." If the "health of the woman" be construed to include her mental health, still in only two states was therapeutic abortion legally permissible on psychiatric indications or to prevent the birth of a malformed child (as in rubella), which might affect the mother's mental health. Since therapeutic abortion to save the life of the woman is rarely necessary, it follows that the great majority of such operations performed in this country went and still go beyond the letter of the law. Nevertheless, experience has shown that if a reputable physician, with the written approval of two other reputable physicians, carries out the operation openly in an accredited hospital, the propriety of the operation is rarely questioned by officers of the law. (For details of the legal status of therapeutic abortion in the United States, consult Harper). Many hospitals have set up abortion committees to decide the permissibility of abortion. Because the intent of these committees is to protect the reputation of the hospital, they have, in general, tended to be restrictive.

There is a growing body of both professional and lay opinion in favor of liberalization of the abortion laws. In 1943, the prestigious New York Academy of Medicine was among the first medical organizations to recognize the need for reform. Since that time the Academy has issued three statements on the subject; the last in 1969 favors repeal of existing abortion laws.

In 1959, the American Law Institute suggested a Model Penal Code governing abortion. This code would authorize therapeutic abortion when a licensed physician believes there is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother, or that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defects, or that the pregnancy resulted from rape by force, or incest. Two physicians must certify in writing their belief in the justifying circumstance.

In 1967 the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association went on record as supporting reform of the abortion laws conforming to the general guidelines set forth in the Model Penal Code. In 1965 the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists recommended, in addition to the provision of the Model Penal Code, that social and total economic environment, actual or reasonably foreseeable, be considered as having a bearing on the health of the mother.

Between 1967 and 1969 eleven states amended their abortion laws by extending the indications for therapeutic termination of pregnancy. The new abortion act in Great Britain (1967) is among the most permissive of all recently enacted statutes. It contains two significant clauses in respect to the ascertainment of health of the mother:

1. "Account be taken of the pregnant woman's actual or reasonably foreseeable environment.
2. "Account be taken not only of the effect of pregnancy on the mother but on any existing children of her family."

If liberally construed, the current British abortion law is tantamount to virtually unrestricted abortion.

The report of Governor Rockefeller's special commission to review the New York State Abortion Law was published in March, 1968. The recommendations follow the Model Penal Code, but add two additional indications for abortion as follows:

1. "The pregnancy commenced while the female was unmarried and under 16 years of age, and is still unmarried.
2. "When the female already has four living children."

The principal arguments in favor of a more permissive abortion statute have been summarized by the Governor's special commission as follows:

1. "The deaths, sterility and harmed physical and mental health, resulting from the large number of illegal abortions each year could largely be prevented if such abortions were performed by competent physicians in proper hospital surroundings, within the framework of reasonable legislation.
2. "The wide disparity between the statutory law and actual practice encourages disrespect for the law and places upon the conscientious physician an intolerable conflict between his medical duty to his patients and his duty as a citizen to uphold the law.
3. "The present law places an unfair discrimination on the poor. Persons with money may obtain safe abortions either by traveling to other jurisdictions, by going to high-priced, competent though illegal abortionists, or by obtaining legal abortion here based on 'sophisticated' psychiatric indications."

The divergence between the literal interpretation of the law and current medical practice has led today's physician into an area of grave legal risk. There are indications that the courts may take action when reputable medical practice in accredited hospitals does not conform to strict interpretation of rigid abortion laws.

In 1969 there were two court decisions of major importance in this field. On September 5 the California Supreme Court in the case of People v. Belous declared the pre-1967 California abortion law unconstitutional on the following grounds:

1. The phrase "necessary to preserve life" is unconstitutionally vague;
2. "The fundamental rights of the woman to choose whether to bear children" is a right of privacy which the statute unconstitutionally abridges;
3. The statute violates the Fourteenth Amendment because of the "delegation of decision making power to a directly involved individual" (i.e., the doctor might be penalized for approving a request for abortion but not for denying a request).

In November, 1969, a decision in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia declared unconstitutional that part of the statute outlawing abortions other than those done "for the preservation of the mother's life or health." The reasoning was similar to, and in part relied upon, that in the Belous decision.

The New York law was recently challenged in the Federal Court for the Southern District of New York. The complaint in this case alleged that the abortion law is unconstitutional on grounds similar to those cited in the California case.

Minority reports accompanying many of these reports and resolutions are best summarized by the conclusion to The Minority Report of the Governor's Commission Appointed to Review New York State's Abortion Law, as follows: "Because we consider the proposals of the majority of our Committee to be violative of the fundamental rights of the human child in utero and detrimental to our traditional and still viable ideals of the sanctity of human life and the integrity of the family unit, we dissent."

The reform of abortion laws along the guidelines drawn by the American Law Institute has not worked well. Although the number of abortions has increased markedly, the poor still find it difficult to obtain abortions even in situations of obvious merit. Illegal abortions have probably not decreased. The laws are vague and in many instances capriciously interpreted (Monroe; Russell and Jackson; Droegemueller and co-workers; and Overstreet).

Although some states, notably Hawaii, Alaska, Washington, and New York have repealed their abortion laws, in most instances the solution to this complex problem may stem not from legislative reform of existing statutes but from action of the courts on the constitutionality of abortion laws. (For full discussion of the constitutional questions, see Lucas.)

Indications. The indications for therapeutic abortion are discussed with the diseases that most commonly lead to the operation. A well-documented indication is heart disease in the wake of previous decompensation (p. 783). Another commonly accepted indication is advanced hypertensive vascular disease (p. 738). Still another is carcinoma of the cervix (p. 841).

Currently the two most frequently encountered indications for therapeutic abortion are psychiatric disease and potential abnormalities of the fetus. Among 4,675 therapeutic abortions performed in New York City between 1951 and 1962, inclusive, the major indication for the operation was a mental disorder (Gold and co-workers). Many, however, believe that interruption of pregnancy on psychiatric grounds is often a double-edged sword, which may aggravate rather than ameliorate psychotic tendencies. In the opinion of both Pearce and Martin, when the operation is carried out on mentally unstable women, 25 to 50 per cent are left with remorse and guilt. Even in the case of abortion for nonpsychiatric indications, Gebhard and associates found evidence of prolonged psychiatric trauma in 9 per cent of a sample of American women in whom the operation had been performed therapeutically or criminally. McCoy found that 27 percent of 62 women questioned at least one year after therapeutic abortion expressed varying degrees of regret. Seventy-three per cent of his patients were satisfied, and those for whom pregnancy was socially untenable rarely regretted the operation. Niswander and Patterson found that a similar percentage of their patients regretted the operation. Sim, an English psychiatrist, makes the sweeping statement: "There are no psychiatric grounds for termination of pregnancy." There is little information about the psychologic impact on the patient of refusal of her request for abortion. These women rarely commit suicide even though they may threaten to do so, however, among 249 Swedish women who were denied abortion, Hook found only 23 per cent who had accepted the situation and made a satisfactory adjustment.

Potential abnormality of the fetus as an indication for therapeutic abortion comes up most frequently in connection with maternal rubella. We believe that the operation is justified in selected cases (p. 808). As intrauterine diagnostic technics improve, the problem of serious fetal malformation will present more frequently. Valenti and colleagues have reported a therapeutic abortion performed on the basis of a firm diagnosis of Down's syndrome. Recently Schneck and colleagues have made an intrauterine diagnosis of Tay Sachs enzymatic disease. Other enzymatic disorders can be diagnosed with reasonable accuracy (Ch. 38, p. 1078).

It is impossible to predict what the future acceptable indications for therapeutic abortion will be. It is certain, however, that public opinion will not tolerate much longer the disregard of patients with unwanted pregnancies complicated by serious social problems. The new abortion policy of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists succinctly states the matter as follows:

> Therapeutic abortion may be performed for the following established medical indications:
> 1. When continuation of the pregnancy may threaten the life of the woman or seriously impair her health. In determining whether or not there is such risk to health, account may be taken of the patient's total environment, actual or reasonably foreseeable.

2. When pregnancy has resulted from rape or incest: In this case the same medical criteria should be employed in the evaluation of the patient.
3. When continuation of the pregnancy is likely to result in the birth of a child with grave physical deformities or mental retardation.

Incidence. Tietze and Lewit estimate that about 8,000 therapeutic abortions per year were performed in hospitals in the United States from 1963 to 1965 (see also Rowe). This ratio of about 2 abortions per 1,000 live births contrasts with 70 per 1,000 live births in Sweden. In Hungary the number of abortions exceeds the number of live births. As the result of a sharp and continuing decline in traditional medical indications (heart disease, hypertension, pulmonary tuberculosis, and hyperemesis, for example), the number of operations performed on these grounds has fallen dramatically over the past two decades, with the result that interruption of pregnancy on physical indications is becoming rare.

Technic. Vaginal therapeutic abortion may be performed by the traditional dilatation and curettage or by the more recently introduced suction technic. The likelihood of uterine perforation, cervical laceration, hemorrhage, incomplete removal of the placenta, and infection increases sharply after the twelfth week, and perhaps somewhat earlier in primigravidas; for this reason neither dilatation and curettage nor suction curettage should be performed when the duration of pregnancy has exceeded that limit. If interruption of more advanced pregnancy is urgent, abdominal hysterotomy, hysterectomy, or intraamniotic injection of hypertonic saline are preferable.

There are other circumstances in which abdominal hysterotomy or hysterectomy is preferable to the vaginal operation. If, for example, sterilization is to be included in the procedure, combining hysterotomy with tubal ligation in a single operation or performing a hysterectomy is sometimes preferable to the two separate procedures. If the therapeutic abortion is done for medical or serious psychiatric indications, it is often carried out abdominally, because many of these indications for the operation are sound reasons for sterilization also. Still another advantage of abdominal hysterotomy is the greater likelihood of complete evacuation of the uterine contents, particularly if care is exercised in incising the uterine wall, so that the gestational sac may be delivered intact.

Light inhalation anesthesia with or without a muscle relaxant is usually satisfactory for the vaginal operation. The cervix is more easily dilatable if 1 per cent procaine or xylocaine is injected bilaterally into the paracervical tissues. Warming of the dilators is also helpful. To lessen the likelihood of uterine perforation an infusion of 10 units of oxytocin in 500 ml of saline or Ringer's lactate solution is sometimes given slowly during the operation. After the usual preparations for a vaginal operation, the cervix is grasped with a tenaculum and the depth of the uterine cavity is measured by a sound. Care is taken that no instrument be introduced into the uterus beyond that depth. The cervix is very gradually dilated with a series of Hegar dilators (Fig. 1). As shown in Figure 2, the fourth and fifth fingers of the hand introducing the Hegar dilators should rest on the patient's buttock as a further safeguard against uterine perforation. It is our opinion that a sharp curette is more efficacious and that its dangers are not greater than those of the dull instrument in the usual therapeutic abortion. Perforations of the uterus rarely occur on the downstroke of the curette but may occur when any instrument is introduced into the uterus; since the knife edge of a sharp curette is directed downward, it can have no bearing on this hazard. Any curette, however, is a dangerous instrument if injudicious force is applied to it. As shown in Figure 3 the necessary manipulations should be carried out with the thumb and forefingers only.

Fig. 2. Dilatation of cervix with Hegar dilator. Note that the fourth and fifth fingers rest against the buttock. This maneuver is a most important safety measure because, if the cervix relaxes abruptly, these fingers prevent a sudden and uncontrolled thrust of the dilator, a common cause of perforation of the uterus.

Suction curettage, introduced by Wu and Wu in China in 1958, has furnished

Fig. 3. Introduction of the curette. Note that the instrument is held merely with the thumb and forefinger; in the upward movement of the curette only the strength of these two fingers should be used. Moreover, just as soon as the curette has entered the cervical canal, the fourth and last fingers rest on the buttock as further protection against uterine perforation. Still another safeguard is the administration of 5 units of oxytocin 15 minutes before the operation and again as the patient is being draped.

a quick, nearly painless and almost completely safe method of performing therapeutic abortions before the twelfth week of gestation. This technic is now the method of choice in the U.S.S.R. (Reid) and in other countries of eastern Europe. It is receiving increasing attention in Great Britain (Kerslake and Casey) and in the United States. The suction curettes are hollow tubes of different diameters, with a moderate-sized opening at or near the tip. A glass trap is interposed between the curette and a vacuum pump. Under paracervical block or light general anesthesia the cervix is dilated sufficiently to allow passage of the curette. Oxytocin is usually administered, and suction up to 760 mm Hg is obtained by covering the bypass at the base of the curette with the thumb. The curette is swept gently around the interior of the uterus until no further products of conception can be seen entering the trap. The entire procedure takes from two to three minutes. It is too soon to predict whether current enthusiasm for this method will be sustained. Perforation of the uterus is not unknown, however.

After the fourteenth week of pregnancy, when the fundus can be palpated through the abdominal wall, abortion may be brought about by the intraamniotic injection of hypertonic saline or 50 per cent glucose solution. The exact mechanism of action is still uncertain. Klopper has shown a rapid fall in estriol excretion after the injection of hypertonic saline. Pregnanediol remains at the same level, however, until the abortion is terminated. Such technics are not new, Boero having produced abortion with an intraamniotic injection of dilute formalin as early as 1935. In 1958, Brosset passed a needle through the abdominal wall into the uterine cavity, withdrew 50 ml of amniotic fluid, and injected an equivalent amount of 50 per cent dextrose in water. In his series, the interval between injection and abortion averaged 38 hours. Since then, articles by numerous authors (Jaffin and associates; Wood and colleagues; Weingold and co-workers; and Goehberg and Reid) have attested the efficacy of this method, using 50 to 200 ml of either 50 per cent dextrose or the even more effective 20 per cent saline. These technics may obviate the necessity for hysterotomy in therapeutic abortion. Although they are far safer than the original technic utilizing formalin, there is danger of infection, especially when dextrose solution is employed. Peel has reported a death from this procedure, caused by the staphylococcus, and Briggs and MacDonald and colleagues have reported deaths caused by Clostridium perfringens.

Inadvertent introduction of hypertonic saline into the maternal circulation carries the likelihood of serious central nervous system and cardiopulmonary reactions. Cameron and Dayan have reported two new deaths as well as five others collected from the literature. All the patients had a high concentration of sodium in the blood and damage to the brain. Six patients showed extreme dehydration. Another reported complication following hypertonic saline is defective hemostasis caused by hypofibrinogenemia and related coagulation defects (Goldstein and also Quilligan). Between 1946 and 1950, more than 70 papers on this technic were published. There were 18 deaths between 1949 and 1952 alone (Wagatsuma). The method is no longer used in Japan. In contrast, both Goodlin and Schiffer report good results in moderately large series. Eastman comments on these studies as follows: "The intramuscular injection of hypertonic saline for the induction of labor, if without substantial hazard, fills a real need in obstetrics; but only time will tell whether precautionary measures against hypernatremia will prevent such catastrophes as here reported."

In 22,179 cases, both gynecologic and obstetric, in which dilatation and curettage were performed for various reasons in two Baltimore hospitals, perforation of the uterus was recognized in 47, or once in about 500 operations, as reported by Badman and Korman. This figure agrees fairly well with that of Kushner and Dill, who report one known perforation in 700 operations. Although it is customary to regard the curette as the main offending instrument, Kushner and Dill point out that in their series of 21 perforations the curette caused less than one third. In the remainder a sponge stick, a sound, or dilators (both Hegar and Goodell) were the perforating instruments in about equal numbers.

The management of perforation of the uterus depends on the clinical events following the accident, particularly with regard to the extent of damage to other pelvic or abdominal viscera. Constant close observation of the patient for signs of peritoneal irritation or abdominal hemorrhage is therefore required. In the Baltimore series cited, abdominal exploration was deemed advisable in about one half the cases. In other series the comparable fraction has been somewhat smaller, averaging perhaps one third or less. In doubtful cases of perforation expectant treatment is the best course.

The morbidity and mortality rates from therapeutic abortion can be documented only from countries with permissive laws. In 23,666 therapeutic abortions performed in Denmark, the mortality rate was 0.7 per 1,000 operations, and serious but nonfatal sequelae ensued in 3.2 per cent (Berthelsen and Østergaard). These sequelae included 98 cases of perforation of the uterus and 122 cases of salpingitis, peritonitis, and septicemia. In addition, 113 cases of nonfatal but serious complications followed 5,320 abdominal hysterotomies, or 2.1 per cent.

The mortality rates appear to be correlated closely with the ease of obtaining abortion and the period in pregnancy when the operation is performed. Thus there is a mortality rate of about 4 per 100,000 abortions in the countries of eastern Europe and Japan, where abortion is not permitted after the third month of pregnancy and is entirely permissive. In contrast, the mortality rate is nearly 70 per 100,000 abortions in Denmark, where abortion may be performed later in pregnancy and is relatively more frequently done for serious medical disease.

Mortality with Contraception and Induced Abortion

THE following paper was written by Christopher Tietze, M.D., Associate Director, Bio-Medical Division, The Population Council. We are pleased to be able to present it here.

AN unwanted pregnancy can be avoided by the use of contraception; an unwanted birth, by induced abortion. Since the ultimate objectives are identical, it is appropriate to compare the two approaches in terms of the risks to the woman's life associated with their use. This can be done by means of a statistical model, based on 100,000 women of reproductive age in fertile unions and exposed to the risk of pregnancy, assuming the following rates of mortality.

1. Maternal Mortality from complications of, or associated with, pregnancy, childbirth, and the puerperium, excluding induced abortion: 20 deaths per 100,000 pregnancies. This rate corresponds to the current level of maternal mortality in the white population in the United States. Official statistics of maternal mortality in the United States are based only on deaths attributed to complications of pregnancy, childbirth, and the puerperium. Thus defined, the rate of maternal mortality, excluding abortion, was 18 per 100,000 live births in 1964–66.

"Associated" deaths, related to pregnancy and childbirth, but attributed to other causes, e.g., heart disease, are not available for the United States. In England, where such associated deaths are identified and shown separately, they comprise about one-third of the number of deaths attributed to complications of pregnancy, childbirth, and the puerperium. Raising the maternal mortality rate for the U.S. by one-third brings it to 24 per 100,000 live births. Since the number of spontaneous fetal deaths appears to be on the order of one-sixth of all pregnancies and since very few deaths result from spontaneous abortion, an overall risk to life, excluding induced abortion, of 20 per 100,000 pregnancies would seem to be a reasonable approximation.

2. Mortality associated with illegal abortion induced out of hospital by persons without medical training: 100 deaths per 100,000 abortions. This is a very rough estimate, and, almost certainly conservative, since it is lower than the maternal mortality rate, excluding abortion, per 100,000 live births for white women in the United States 25 years ago. Fortunately, the precise level of this rate is not relevant to the argument.

3. Mortality associated with legal abortion performed in hospital, at an early stage of gestation: 3 deaths per 100,000 abortions, based on current statistics from eastern Europe (73 deaths among 2,567,000 legal abortions in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Slovenia, 1957–67).[1]

4. Mortality associated with highly effective contraception: 3 deaths per 100,000 users per year, based on the studies recently published in Great Britain, on excess mortality from thromboembolic disease attributable to the use of oral contraceptives. According to the report by Inman and Vessey,[2] the excess mortality from pulmonary embolism, cerebral thrombosis, and coronary thrombosis was 2.2 and 4.5 per 100,000 users for women 20–34 and 35–44 years of age, respectively. A weighted average of these two figures yields an annual excess risk to life of about 3 per 100,000 users.

Line 1 of Table 1 illustrates the reproductive behavior of a group of women neither using contraception nor having recourse to induced abortion.

The interval between two successive conceptions consists of three segments: the period of gestation (G), the anovulatory period following confinement (A), and the average number of ovulatory cycles required for a new conception to occur (O).[3] Of these three segments, the first (G) can be estimated within narrow limits as eight months, allowing for about 15 per cent spontaneous abortions. The anovulatory period (A) is known to vary widely, depending on the extent and average duration of breastfeeding. The present model allows for a range from 4 months without breastfeeding to 14 months with universal and prolonged breastfeeding. The mean value for the third segment (O), also estimated at eight months, may be too high.

The relationship between the number of pregnancies (P and P'), the number of women (W), the time factor (T), and the duration of the three segments of the in-

TABLE 1. Illustrative Annual Rates of Pregnancies and of Deaths Associated with Contraception, Pregnancy, and Induced Abortion per 100,000 Women of Reproductive Age in Fertile Unions

	Pregnancies	Deaths
1. No contraception, no induced abortion	40,000–60,000	8–12
2. No contraception, all pregnancies aborted out of hospital	100,000	100
3. Ditto, aborted in hospital	100,000	3
4. Highly effective contraception	100	3
5. Moderately effective contraception, no induced abortion	11,800–13,000	2.5
6. Ditto, all pregnancies aborted out of hospital	14,300	14.3
7. Ditto, aborted in hospital	14,300	0.4

terval between conceptions (G, A, and O) is defined by the following formula:

$$P = \frac{W \times T}{G + A + O}$$

In our model, T equals 12 months and G, A, and O are also expressed in months. The application of the formula to the estimate described in the preceding paragraph yields the following results:

$$P = \frac{100{,}000 \times 12}{8 + 4 + 8} = \frac{1{,}200{,}000}{20} = 60{,}000$$

$$P' = \frac{100{,}000 \times 12}{8 + 14 + 8} = \frac{1{,}200{,}000}{30} = 40{,}000$$

Thus, without contraception or induced abortion, 100,000 women experience in the course of one year between 40,000 and 60,000 pregnancies, corresponding to average intervals between conceptions ranging from 20 months to 30 months. Given the level of maternal mortality, excluding abortion, assumed for this model, of 20 per 100,000 pregnancies, the 100,000 women would experience between 8 and 12 deaths associated with the reproductive process.

Line 2 assumes no contraception, but all pregnancies are aborted out of hospital. Because gestation and the post-gestational anovulatory period are both substantially shorter than under the assumptions of the preceding line (G = 3 months, A = 1 month), the number of pregnancies rises to 100,000 with 100 deaths:

In line 3, the same number of abortions is performed legally in hospitals, resulting in 3 deaths instead of 100.

Line 4 assumes a highly effective method of contraception, such as the consistent use of oral anti-ovulants under the combined regimen. The expected number of pregnancies is on the order of 100.[4] Excess deaths from thromboembolic disease equal those resulting from legal abortions in hospitals, shown on the preceding line. Because of the small number of pregnancies, mortality associated with either pregnancy and childbirth or with abortion is insignificant.

A comparison of lines 3 and 4 shows that women regulating their fertility exclusively by means of abortions performed in hospitals are exposed to a risk to life of the same order of magnitude as an equal number of women using oral contraception consistently over the same period of time.

Lines 5, 6, and 7 each assumes a less effective but completely safe type of contraception which extends the average duration of ovulatory exposure required for conception from 8 to 80 months. This level of contraceptive effectiveness was approximately achieved by urban American couples in the 1950's, using the diaphragm or condoms, mainly for child spacing, and not for family limitation.[5]

Line 5 assumes no induced abortions and the number of conceptions is computed as follows:

$$P' = \frac{100{,}000 \times 12}{8 + 14 + 80} = \frac{1{,}200{,}000}{102} \cong 11{,}800$$

The corresponding number of deaths is on the order of 2.5 per 100,000 women per year.

Line 6 assumes that all pregnancies are aborted out of hospital by lay abortionists. The number of pregnancies increases slightly, owing to the shorter gestation and post-gestational anovulatory periods.

The expected number of deaths is 14.3 per 100,000 women per year.

In line 7, the same number of abortions is performed legally in hospitals and the number of deaths drops to 0.4 per 100,000 women or approximately one-seventh of the corresponding values shown in line 3 for no contraception but legal abortion, and in line 4, for oral contraception.

On the basis of this model, the following is my conclusion: In terms of the risk to life, the most rational procedure for regulating fertility is the use of a perfectly safe, although not 100 per cent effective, method of contraception and the termination of pregnancies resulting from contraceptive failure under the best possible circumstances, i.e., in the operating room of a hospital.

While comparable estimates of morbidity, associated with pregnancy and childbirth, abortion out of hospital and in hospital, and oral contraception, are not available, it is not unlikely that the pattern would be similar to that which has been demonstrated in terms of mortality.

ABORTION LAWS AND ABORTION PRACTICES IN EUROPE

CHRISTOPHER TIETZE*

Legislation regulating abortion in Europe runs the gamut from complete prohibition in Belgium and Ireland to abortion on request in Hungary and the U.S.S.R.[1] In a number of countries, de facto practice is more permissive than the indications recognized de jure. As shown in Table I, listing all countries with more than one million inhabitants and based in part on a compilation by Hubinont[2], the predominantly Catholic countries of western and southern Europe have the most restrictive legislation. Where artificial termination of pregnancy is not entirely prohibited, it is permitted for the single purpose of saving the woman's life or on narrowly interpreted medical indication, i.e., to avert a serious threat to the woman's health, without consideration of the circumstances under which she has to live. In a few countries, eugenic and/or humanitarian indications are also recognized, at least de facto. Generally, therapeutic abortion is done rarely and with reluctance, but this is not universally true and in a few cities, notably in Switzerland, the practices of the medical profession are very liberal.[3, 4]

Northern Europe[5]

The first countries in Europe to take steps toward the liberalization of their abortion laws were Iceland, Sweden, and Denmark, during the 1930's. After World War II, Sweden in 1946 and again in 1963,[6] and Denmark in 1956,[7] further revised their abortion laws. Finland passed a liberal abortion statute in 1950[8] and Norway in 1960.[9] In the latter country, the new law merely codified what had long been accepted medical practice.

The range of acceptable indications is roughly the same in Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Finland. In each instance the law recognizes a medical indication, a eugenic indication, and a humanitarian indication. The scope of the medical indication has been explicitly extended to include considerations of a mixed socio-medical character. The wording of the Danish statute of 1956 will serve as an example. Under this statute, termination of pregnancy is permitted 'if the induction of an abortion is necessary to avert a serious danger to the life or health of the woman. In order to evaluate this danger, an appreciation shall be made of all the circumstances of the case, including the conditions under which the woman will have to live, and consideration shall be given not only to physical or mental illness, but also to any actual or potential state of physical or mental infirmity'.[7]

In regard to the eugenic indication, the older statutes mention only the hereditary transmission of mental disease, mental deficiency, and other severe illness or defect. Sweden's Royal Medical Board, however, has authorized the termination of pregnancy on psychiatric indication in many cases of German measles and in at least one celebrated case of thalidomide use.[10, 11] The 1963 amendment to the Swedish law and the new Danish and Norwegian statutes extend the traditional eugenic indication to cover damage or disease acquired during intrauterine life. The humanitarian indication applies to pregnancies resulting from offenses against the penal code, such as forcible and statutory rape, as well as incest.

With minor exceptions, the maximum period of gestation at which abortion is permissible is five months in Sweden, four months in Denmark and Finland, and three months in Norway.

Examination of the administrative machinery implementing the abortion statutes in these four countries of northern Europe reveals important differences. The procedure is most centralized in Sweden, where, until 1965, more than 85 percent of all legal abortions were authorized by the Royal Medical Board in Stockholm, which makes its decision on the basis of a written report from the physician who has examined the woman seeking abortion. The remaining 15 percent of the terminations were performed on the authority of a certificate signed by two physicians. The latter type of authorization accounted for one-fourth of all cases in 1966 and about one-third in 1967, possibly indicating a greater willingness on the part of Swedish doctors to accept responsibility for the decision.

In Denmark, most legal abortions require the unanimous authorization of a committee of three persons, attached to the local Mothers' Aid, a publicly supported organization, which conducts a thorough medical and social investigation. Twenty such committees have been established throughout the country, including five in Greater Copenhagen, each consisting of a psychiatrist, a gynecologist, and a social worker. Abortion on purely medical indications, where the threat to life and health results from a disease and not from the conditions under which the woman lives, may be performed on the sole authority of the appropriate chief of service. These cases represent about one-tenth of the total number of legal abortions in Denmark.

In Finland and Norway, the administrative machinery is relatively decentralized, with most legal abortions approved by two physicians, one of whom must be a gynecologist or surgeon on the permanent staff of a hospital. In Finland, the other physician is drawn from a roster of medical specialists established by the State Medical Board; in Norway, he is appointed by the county health officer and must be trained in psychiatry or social medicine.

In recent years, commissions of experts to re-evaluate the abortion question have been appointed in Sweden, Denmark, and Finland. The report of the Danish commission was published in early 1969.[18] A majority of its members rejected abortion on request, at least 'for the time being', but recommended four new indications for the interruption of pregnancy: Advanced age ('If the woman has completed her thirty-eighth year prior to the end of the twelfth week of pregnancy'), multiparity ('If the woman has given birth to at least four children who live at home and are under eighteen years of age'), immaturity ('If the woman, because of her youth or immaturity, cannot for the time being take care of the child in a responsible manner'), and social stress ('If pregnancy, childbirth, or care for the child may be assumed to result in severe stress on the woman, which cannot be averted in any other way, so that termination of pregnancy is considered necessary in consideration of the woman, the maintenance of the home, or the care of other children in the family'). H. Hoffmeyer, in a minority report, supported abortion on request for all women. The committee also recommended that the maximum period of gestation at which a pregnancy may be terminated be reduced from sixteen weeks to twelve weeks.

The reports of the Swedish and Finnish commissions are not yet available for analysis. Because it is known that the Swedish commission was given a mandate for a further liberalization of the indications for abortion, its recommendations and the resulting action of the legislature, if any, are expected with keen anticipation.

Legal abortions in Sweden increased from less than 0.1 per 1,000 population in 1939, following the enactment of a liberalized abortion law, to 0.9 per 1,000 in 1951, after which the trend was reversed, and the abortion rate dropped below 0.3 per 1,000 during the seven years 1957–63 (Table II and Figure 1), although the upward trend was resumed in 1961. Five years later the abortion rate surpassed the high point of the early 1950's and in 1967 it reached a peak of about 1.2 abortions per 1,000 population.[19] The course of events in Denmark was roughly parallel to that in Sweden, on a higher level, at least until 1966.[20]

In Sweden about 35 percent of the women undergoing legal abortion in 1964–65 were single, 55 percent were married, and 10 percent were widows or divorcées. About 75 percent had previously given birth, including 10 percent with five or more children.[21] In Denmark the proportions of married women (79 percent), parous women (89 percent), and mothers of five or more children (12 percent) were higher, but there were relatively fewer single women (14 percent) and previously married women (7 percent).[22] These statistics are based, respectively, on abortions approved by the Royal Medical Board in Sweden and the Mothers' Aid organization in Denmark; abortions authorized by two physicians (Sweden) or by the chief of service (Denmark) are excluded.

In Norway, two special surveys established the numbers of abortions performed in hospitals at about 0.6 per 1,000 population in 1949 and 0.9 per 1,000 in 1954.[15] After the law of 1960 had become operative in February, 1964, the abortion rate increased to 1.2 per 1,000 population in 1966.[16]

In Finland, legal abortions rose from about 0.7 per 1,000 population in 1951 to 1.4 per 1,000 in 1960. Over the next five years a decline to 1.0 per 1,000 was recorded.[17] In Iceland, according to unpublished data furnished by the Ministry of Health, legal abortions averaged slightly more than fifty per year during the decade 1954–63 without a discernible trend; this figure corresponds to 0.3 abortions per 1,000 population.

medical indication and, most often, on psychiatric grounds. The eugenic and humanitarian indications play very minor roles.

One of the major goals of the liberalization of abortion statutes in northern Europe was to reduce the incidence of illegal abortion. A further objective was to reduce the total number of abortions, legal and illegal combined, by establishing early contact with the pregnant woman and making available to her a broad range of social services. There is no agreement among Scandinavian authors as to what extent the first of these objectives has been achieved, and it is even less likely that the second goal has been realized in any of the countries concerned.[19–21] Whether the abortion laws have actually contributed to what has been referred to as 'abortion mentality' is a much debated question.

A by-product of the liberal laws of northern Europe has been the compilation of nation-wide statistics on mortality associated with legal abortion (Table III). The longest continuous have been comprehensively surveyed by Lindahl.[27] Ekblad and others have studied the mental and emotional sequelae among women who had legal abortions,[28, 29] women whose abortion was approved but not carried out,[29] and those whose application was refused,[31] as well as among their children.[29]

For Finland, eighteen deaths were reported among 27,100 legal abortions in 1950-57, corresponding to a rate of 66 per 100,000.[28]

United Kingdom

The most recent addition to the roster of countries with extended indications for legal abortion is Great Britain. According to the common law, which is the basis of the British legal system, abortion prior to quickening was not a crime, while abortion after quickening was considered a misdemeanor.[33] In 1803, abortion was made a statutory offense and a felony, although its performance was less severely punished prior to quickening than after quickening.

The Offenses Against the Person Act, enacted in 1861, made 'unlawfully' induced abortion a felony punishable by life imprisonment. The Act did not define 'unlawfully' and made no provision for the therapeutic termination of pregnancy. However, in 1938, in the famous case of Rex vs. Bourne, Mr. Justice Macnaughten ruled that abortion need not be unlawful if done in good faith to preserve the mother's life. He further instructed the jury as follows: 'If the doctor is of the opinion . . . that the probable consequences . . . will be to make the woman a physical and mental wreck, the jury is quite entitled to take the view that the doctor . . . is operating for the purpose of preserving the life of the mother'. Bourne, who had aborted a young girl who had been the victim of a gang-rape attack, was acquitted and a legal precedent was set.[38]

Nevertheless, the official attitude and practice of the British medical profession remained basically conservative, especially in regard to non-private patients. About 1,570 therapeutic abortions were performed in the National Health Service (NHS) hospitals in England and Wales in 1958, rising to 2,830 in 1962 and to 6,380 in 1966. Over the same period, the abortion rate rose from 0.03 to 0.06 to 0.13 per 1,000 population. Women able to pay the customary fee of 100 guineas ($ 290) or more found it notably easier to obtain abortions, especially in London. The total number of therapeutic abortions, including a minimum estimate of those performed in private practice, increased to about 21,000 in 1966.[39] The latter figure corresponds to a rate of about 0.4 per 1,000 population.

In October, 1967, after a long and bitter legislative struggle,[39,40] Parliament enacted a liberalized abortion statute, authorizing abortion if two physicians '. . . are of the opinion, formed in good faith: that the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk to the life of the pregnant woman or of injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman or any existing children of her family, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated; or that there is a substantial risk that if the child were born it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped'.[39] The Act provides further that 'in determining whether or not there is such risk of injury to health, account may be taken of the pregnant woman's environment both at the time when the child was born and thereafter so far as foreseeable.' Abortions may be performed in NHS hospitals or in facilities approved by the Minister of Health. The latter category includes private nursing homes. Conscientious objectors are specifically excused from participating in abortion procedures. The Act applies to England, Wales, and Scotland, but not to Northern Ireland; it came into force on April 27, 1968, after the appropriate regulations had been issued.[39] Guidelines for physicians in evaluating medical indications have been published by the British Medical Association.[40]

The British Abortion Act of 1967 contains a number of revolutionary innovations. Potentially most important are the words 'greater than if the pregnancy were terminated,' qualifying the 'risk to life or of injury to physical or mental health' of a continuing pregnancy. While this clause was inserted at a late stage of the legislative process, at the request of opponents of liberalization, it has been interpreted as justifying abortion in order to secure a relatively small improvement in the woman's medical condition, since at least the risk to life associated with early abortion under favorable conditions is substantially less than the risk normally associated with pregnancy and childbirth.[41]

Another important passage are the seven words 'or any existing children of her family'. Couched in medical terms, this phrase constitutes a recognition of the fact that not only the mother but her entire family may be adversely affected by the birth of an unwanted child. It should also be noted that the Act does not establish administrative machinery to authorize the termination of pregnancy. Any two physicians can make the determination if they feel that the required conditions are met.

A definitive evaluation of the new British abortion statute will not be possible for some time. During the first year of operation of the Act about 37,700 abortions were reported in England and Wales, including 22,900 in the NHS hospitals and about 15,200 in private practice. It would appear, then, that the number of therapeutic abortions under the NHS has more than tripled, as compared with 1966, while the total for England and Wales has increased to a level of 0.8 legal abortions per 1,000 population. Of the women undergoing abortion, about 48 percent were single, 44 percent were married, and 8 percent widowed, divorced, or separated.[42]

The trend of legal abortions in Britain in the years to come will depend largely on the attitude of the medical profession. At present, resistance to abortion is often encountered, especially outside of London. One of the major centers of opposition is Birmingham. In one of the city's NHS hospitals, both consultants in obstetrics are Roman Catholics, who do not perform abortions. They are said to refer applicants to another hospital where the chief of the obstetric service has recently boasted that only one abortion was performed on his service in the course of a year. The psychiatrist at the same hospital is Dr. Myre Sim, who feels that 'there are no psychiatric grounds for the termination of pregnancy' and who moved the resolution against abortion reform at the conference of the British Medical Association in 1967.[39] In response to this situation, which makes it impossible for sympathetic general practitioners to refer their patients to local hospitals, a group of physicians and other professional workers have formed the Birmingham Pregnancy Advisory Service, which counsels women on whether they have lawful grounds for abortion, and if they have, tries to help them obtain it. The group hopes to start its own abortion center.[41] Similar groups may be organized in other cities.

Although statutes and practices relating to abortion are much more liberal in northern Europe and in Britain than in the majority of European countries or in the United States, abortion has, in fact, been 'legalized' on limited grounds only. Several of the socialist countries in eastern Europe have adopted far more radical policies.

Eastern Europe[42-58]

In eastern Europe, abortion policy has undergone several major changes since 1920, when interruption of pregnancy at the request of the pregnant woman was legalized in the U.S.S.R. by a joint decree of the Commissariats of Health and Justice. In 1936, another decree restricted legal abortion to a list of specified medical and eugenic indications. In 1955, the policy was once more reversed and the restrictive decree of 1936 repealed by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet.[59]

Following the example of the U.S.S.R., all the socialist countries of eastern Europe, except East Germany and Albania, adopted similar liberalizing legislation.[60-61] In the words of the preamble to the Soviet decree, the aims of this legislation are 'the limitation of the harm caused to the health of women by abortions carried out outside hospitals', and to 'give women the possibility of deciding themselves the question of motherhood.'

Throughout eastern Europe, official concern with overpopulation or rapid population growth is proscribed by Marxist philosophy. Moreover, several of the countries concerned have very low birth rates, and none has a high birth rate by global standards. At least two countries, Czechoslovakia and Hungary, have long pursued an active population policy by means of family allowances for third and later children.

Within the overall pattern of legal abortion, considerable variation between individual countries is apparent. Abortion at the request of the pregnant woman was legalized in the U.S.S.R., Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania. In Poland, the law of 1956 stipulates a 'difficult social situation' as an acceptable reason for the termination of pregnancy. In Czechoslovakia, the law permits abortion for reasons 'which deserve special consideration', among which the Ministry of Health listed in 1957: (a) advanced age, (b) numerous children, (c) loss or disability of husband, (d) broken home, (e) predominant economic responsibility of the woman for the maintenance of the family or the child, (f) difficult circumstances of an unmarried woman resulting from her pregnancy, and (g) pregnancy due to rape or other offense. Late in 1961, a new regulation restricted voluntary abortions on the ground of multiparity to women with three or more living children, and also required a threat to the level of living in cases of predominant economic responsibility of the woman.[62] In Yugoslavia, termination of pregnancy may be authorized if the birth of the child would result in a serious personal, familial, or economic situation for the pregnant woman which cannot be averted in any other way.

Commissions for the authorization of abortion, consisting of physicians and representatives of the social services, have been established in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. Medical boards also exist in Hungary, but their function has become purely formal since they must assent if the applicant insists on having her pregnancy terminated. In Poland, abortion is authorized by a certificate from a single physician.

Throughout eastern Europe abortion is prohibited in cases of pregnancy of more than three months' duration, except for medical reasons, and also if the applicant has undergone an induced abortion during the preceding six months. In some countries, such as Czechoslovakia and Hungary, the operation must be performed in an appropriately equipped and staffed hospital, where the typical period of stay is two or three days followed by sick leave if the woman is a wage earner. In Poland and Yugoslavia, however, many legal abortions are done on ambulatory patients. In recent years, suction curettage has been used on an increasing scale throughout eastern Europe because it is technically easier, faster, and less traumatic than the traditional 'D & C'.[54, 57]

The last few years have brought important changes in the abortion laws and practices of some countries in eastern Europe. These changes took place in East Germany, Rumania, and Bulgaria.

The German Democratic Republic did not participate in the general liberalization of abortion laws during the 1950's. After World War II the draconic regulations of the Third Reich were replaced by a series of State laws under which legal abortion could be performed on medical, eugenic, and humanitarian grounds, and to some extent on social or economic grounds also. These statutes were in turn superseded in 1950 by the Law for the Protection of the Mother and the Child, which permits abortion on medical and eugenic indication only. The decision lies with regional commissions which include among their members not only physicians but also representatives of the social services and the quasi-official Union of German Women.[58, 59] In 1965, these commissions were administratively authorized to extend the scope of the medical indication, taking into account the woman's social environment.[60] Since statistics on legal abortions in the German Democratic Republic have not been published since 1962,[61] the effect of this administrative action cannot be evaluated.

The changes in Rumania and Bulgaria were in the opposite direction. In both countries, abortion on request, to be performed without any formalities in any hospital, had been legalized in 1956–57. Rumania abruptly reversed this policy by a decree issued in October, 1966, restricting abortion to women over forty-five years of age and to mothers supporting four or more living children, in addition to the usual medical, eugenic, and humanitarian indications.[62] The medical indication is narrowly defined as a threat to the woman's life. The preamble to the decree of 1966 refers to the 'great prejudice to the birth rate and the rate of natural increase' resulting from the practice of abortion as well as to 'severe consequences to the health of the woman'. It would appear, however, that the primary reason for the repeal of the law of 1957 was concern over the decline in the birth rate, which by 1966 had dropped to 14.3 per 1,000 population, the second lowest in Europe.

In the case of Bulgaria, the change was far less drastic than in Rumania. According to a regulation issued in February, 1968, interruption of pregnancy is prohibited in the case of a woman without a living child, except in the presence of a serious medical or social indication, established by a women's health center.[63]

Women with one or two children must apply to a board which 'shall explain the harmfulness and dangers of abortion, the need to take the pregnancy to full term, the financial support which the family will receive after the birth of the child and, in general, shall make every effort to dissuade every woman who expresses the desire to have her pregnancy interrupted from doing so'. If, nevertheless, the woman persists in asking for the termination of her pregnancy, the board must give its approval. Women over forty-five years of age and those with three or more children do not require the approval of the above-mentioned board.

This regulation was issued on the basis of a governmental decree for the encouragement of the birth rate. There is no question, therefore, that the interest from abortion on request was motivated primarily by demographic considerations. The birth rate in Bulgaria was 14.9 per 1,000 population in 1966.

The liberalization of abortion laws in the 1950's resulted in spectacular increases in the incidence of legal abortion throughout eastern Europe. The most comprehensive and trustworthy statistics are those for Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Slovenia, the most developed among the constituent republics of Yugoslavia (Table V). The U.S.S.R. has not published any statistics on abortion. There are reasons to believe, however, that the number is very large and the rate very high.[44]

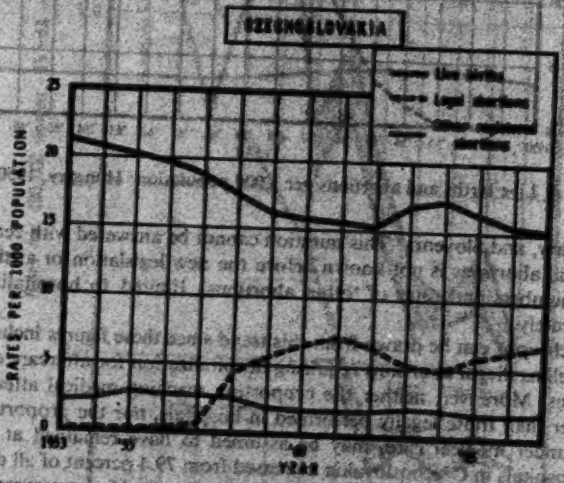

Fig. 2. Live births and abortions per 1,000 population: Czechoslovakia, 1933–67.

In Czechoslovakia (Figure 2), legalization of abortion for non-medical reasons was preceded by almost two years of public discussion. Moderate increases in the abortion rate in 1956 and 1957 reflect the changing attitude of the medical profession.[45] Promulgation of a new and liberalized abortion law in December, 1957, was followed by a steep rise in legal abortions in 1958, which continued at a decelerating pace until 1961, when the rate reached a peak of 6.8 per 1,000 population. The trend was then reversed with a drop to 5.0 per 1,000 in 1963, followed by a renewed upward movement two years later which has continued through 1967.[46, 47]

In Hungary (Figure 3), vigorous efforts to enforce existing laws against criminal abortion in 1952 and 1953 were followed by an increase in births in 1953 and 1954. At about the same time, medical boards for the authorization of therapeutic abortions were established. The growing numbers of legal abortions since 1953 indicate the progressive liberalization of the policies of these boards.[48] After the decree of June 3, 1956, had introduced termination of pregnancy on request, the rate of legal abortions increased rapidly until it reached 18.4 per 1,000 population in 1967, exceeding the birth rate by about one-fourth.[49]

In Slovenia, the rate of legal abortions approaches that found in Czechoslovakia; however, the decline seen in that country during the early 1960's is lacking.[50–52]

slovakia, Hungary, and Slovenia? This question cannot be answered with certainty since the number of illegal abortions is not known before the new legislation or at the present time. The reported numbers and rates of 'other abortions', limited to hospitalized cases, have declined moderately.

No firm conclusions can be drawn from this trend since these figures include spontaneous abortions as well as illegal abortions requiring hospitalization for aftercare or the treatment of complications. Moreover, neither the proportion reaching medical attention among all abortions, other than those legally performed in hospitals, nor the proportion hospitalized among those under medical care, may be assumed to have remained at constant levels. Deliveries in hospitals in Czechoslovakia increased from 79.4 percent of all deliveries in 1955 to 98.1 percent in 1966.[15] The corresponding proportions in Hungary were 67.0 percent in 1956 and 96.6 percent in 1965.[16] To what extent this trend toward greater utilization of institutional facilities extends to the treatment of abortion is a matter of conjecture.

Mortality due to abortion, as reported in national cause-of-death statistics, declined rapidly in Czechoslovakia and Hungary after the enactment of liberal abortion statutes in the 1950's; such a change was not seen at that time in countries without new legislation, such as France or England (Figure 4). The declines are even more marked if the deaths associated with the rising numbers of legal abortions are excluded. It should be noted, however, that the level of abortion mortality in Hungary was still significantly higher, in spite of the downward trend, in the early 1960's than in western Europe, while in Czechoslovakia it was only slightly lower than in France or England.

In summary, then, there is little doubt that the number of criminal abortions has declined substantially but that these declines have been masked by increased hospitalization after spontaneous or illegal abortion, resulting in part from restrictions on the private practice of medicine and in part from the fact that women no longer fear prosecution or harassment by the police. Nevertheless, criminal abortion and/or self-abortion have not disappeared, even in Hungary, where abortion has been available on request for more than a decade. There is evidence that this stubborn survival of clandestine abortion is associated with the relative lack of privacy of the official procedure.[17]

'Other abortions' are reported more frequently in Hungary than in Czechoslovakia. According to Hirschler, the high rate reflects the practice of some gynecologists who admit women to hospitals under the pretext of incomplete abortion in order to avoid charging the prescribed modest fee for abortion on request or because the women live outside the area from which the hospital may admit for this purpose.[29] There is no ready explanation for the relatively high rate of 'other abortions' in Slovenia.

According to the official statistics for 1965, two out of three women undergoing legal abortion in Czechoslovakia (67 percent) were between twenty and thirty-five years of age, compared with three out of four (74 percent) in Hungary.[30,31] Even higher were the proportions of married women (82 percent in Czechoslovakia, 86 percent in Hungary) and of women who had one or more living children at the time of the abortion (88 percent in Czechoslovakia, 85 percent in Hungary). Table VI shows additional detail on these points for Hungary.

Rumanian statistics are fragmentary. According to reports in the literature, which could not be traced to an official source, 112,000 legal abortions were performed in 1958, the first full year after abortion on request was legalized, and 219,000 in 1959.[32] The corresponding abortion rates were 6.2 and 12.0, respectively, per 1,000 population. For 1965, the Central Committee of the Rumanian Communist Party announced a total of 1,115,000 abortions, 58.6 per 1,000, but it is not clear whether this figure refers to legal abortions only or to all abortions.[9] No data are available for the intervening years, which makes it difficult to evaluate the truly extraordinary figure for 1965 which is four times the number of births.

Following the sudden reversal of policy in late 1966 the number of legal abortions in Rumania dropped precipitously. According to a report of a Danish mission visiting Rumania in late 1967, about 15,000 were performed during the first ten months under the new law.[10] Over the same period, about 104,000 so-called spontaneous abortions were reported. The corresponding rates, computed for a full year, were 2.2 and 6.5, respectively, per 1,000 population. While the abortions reported as spontaneous doubtless include many that were illegally induced, the Rumanian authorities suggested that the high rate may reflect, at least in part, a true increase in incidence, resulting from anatomical damage by repeated induced abortions during the preceding years. It was stated that women admitted to hospitals from November 1966 through March 1967 had experienced, on the average, five prior abortions.

The Rumanian birth rate jumped from 14.3 per 1,000 population in 1966 to 38.4 in the third quarter of 1967, followed by a gradual decline, presumably reflecting increased recourse to contraception and/or illegal abortion.

Mortality associated with legal abortion has fallen to very low levels in eastern Europe (Table VII). In Czechoslovakia, thirteen deaths occurred among 413,000 abortions during the period 1958–62, corresponding to a rate of 3.1 deaths per 100,000 abortions. By 1963–67, mortality had dropped to 2.5 per 100,000.[73] Hungary reported a mortality rate of 5.6 per 100,000 abortions in 1957–58,[62] while the most recent figure is 1.2 deaths per 100,000 for 1964–67.[74] In Slovenia, which has the best statistical service among the constituent republics of Yugoslavia, four deaths were reported in 1961–67 among 67,000 legal abortions, corresponding to a rate of 6.0 per 100,000 cases.[75]

Mortality associated with legal abortion is substantially lower in eastern Europe than in northern Europe where rates of about 40 per 100,000 have been reported in recent years. The higher death rates in northern Europe may be attributed in part to the fact that a substantial proportion of legal abortions is performed after the third month of gestation.[36, 39-41] These late abortions contribute heavily to the total number of deaths; in eastern Europe almost all legal abortions are performed in the first trimester of pregnancy, with the majority in the second month. In addition, many women undergoing legal abortion in northern Europe are ill or at least in poor physical condition, while in eastern Europe the overwhelming majority are in good health.

Statistical information on morbidity associated with legal abortion is less complete than information on mortality, and it is very difficult to achieve comparability between countries and even between investigators in the same country.

One of the early studies from Czechoslovakia reported on 7,331 terminations of pregnancy performed in five hospitals, mainly by dilatation and curettage.[44] The rate of early complications was 34 per 1,000 abortions, including twenty cases of infection, ten cases of bleeding, and four injuries per 1,000 women. At about the same time, three Hungarian authors reported on 23,300 legal abortions in one county, including 13,458 in three large hospitals.[45] In the latter group, 32 per 1,000 women experienced early complications, mainly bleeding and fever, with rates in the three hospitals ranging from 7 to 54. In addition, twenty-one women per 1,000 had to be re-admitted within six weeks of the operation. Serious injury was reported in eleven cases per 1,000.

In recent years, the pattern of early morbidity appears to have improved, although serious problems of statistical comparability remain. Table VIII summarizes Hirschler's countrywide data on early complications in Hungary during the period 1960–67.[35] Černoch, in 1965, reported similar figures for Czechoslovakia, without specifying the coverage: Injuries—0.6 per 1,000 abortions, inflammation—5 per 1,000 abortions, 'more profuse bleeding'—3 per 1,000 abortions.[36]

Information on the sequelae of legal abortion in eastern Europe is scanty. In Hungary, premature birth tends to occur more frequently among women who have had induced abortions than among women who have not had them. This is true regardless of age, parity, employment, and other characteristics of the mother.[36–37] The frequency of prematurity tends to increase with the number of prior induced abortions. However, while prematurity is associated with high infant mortality, legal abortions preceding childbearing have not been numerous enough in Hungary to prevent a drop in infant mortality from 58.8 per 1,000 live births in 1956 to 38.4 per 1,000 in 1966.

In summary, then, abortion laws and abortion practices in Europe run the gamut from the traditional restrictions which prevail mainly in the West and South, through liberalization in the North and in Britain, to complete or almost complete legalization in a number of countries of the East. Whatever direction our own way of dealing with abortion takes, we can draw on the experience of Europe and learn from it.

LEGAL ABORTION WITHOUT HOSPITALIZATION

ALAN J. MARGOLIS, MD, FACOG and EDMUND W. OVERSTREET, MD, FACOG

OBSTETRICIANS TODAY are fearfully watching the rising numbers of legal abortions now being performed in various areas of the United States. Rates in some major hospitals have reached 300–500 abortions per 1000 births and continue to increase. In California, since the liberalized (but still moderately restrictive) law took effect in Nov 1967, the rate for the entire state has doubled for each 6-month period. Now it has reached about 60 per 1000 births.

Now that Hawaii, Alaska and New York have repealed all restrictive statutes, those states may be expected rapidly to reach and, doubtlessly, to surpass California's experience. The widespread movement throughout the United States to remove abortion from the ambit of the law and return it to the physician-patient relationship is building enormous impetus and impact. If and when this occurs, the sheer numbers of abortions may well become overwhelming. For example, despite the 15,000-odd legal abortions performed in California in 1969, it is estimated fairly reliably that approximately 76,000 illegal abortions were performed upon California women during that time. Should abortion-on-request simply for the unwanted pregnancy soon become legal, the prospect of 90,000-odd abortions per year would be awesome indeed. Physicians in states in which repeal has already been accomplished are already fearful that the influx of patients from surrounding states may well approximate such a situation. Hence, it is the hope of many that when repeal does come it will be mediated by a major national judicial or legislative decision which will apply to all states uniformly, rather than being brought about by spotty, gradual repeal state by state.

Already, however, many hospitals and their staffs are encountering increasing problems in handling the present numbers of abortions. Encroachment on available hospital beds, limited operating room time, overwhelmed admissions personnel, preoccupation of hospital staff time, and the revolt of residents are only a few of the troubles which have developed. Since we may expect these problems to be compounded tremendously as liberalization of abortion proceeds, it is essential for us to plan ahead in organizing our abortion procedures to handle the expected load.

Various solutions to these problems have been proposed. All of them are ameliorative to some degree. It seems likely that for a period of time, at least, the performance of legal abortions will be reserved to licensed physicians and restricted to hospital premises. Hence, any methodology which spares hospital bed space, operating room time and hospital personnel deserves our serious consideration and our immediate attention in planning for the future.

For these reasons, we wish to draw attention to the experience of this department in the use of outpatient, come-and-go, first-trimester abortion by uterine suction evacuation, and to emphasize the simplicity and the safety of this procedure. Although this method has been used very extensively in Eastern European countries and in Japan, American physicians have been distrustful of it and reluctant to adopt the procedure. Our own preliminary experience in 55 outpatients was presented by one of us (AJM) at the annual meeting of the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians in Boston on April 10, 1970, and details of the results will be published elsewhere.* Since these details will not appear, however, for almost a year, and because the matter is so urgently important, we feel that a brief summary of the results should be presented here.

Fifty-five patients with pregnancies of no greater than 12 weeks' menstrual duration had initial work-ups and therapeutic abortion adjudication procedures as outpatients. Each patient presented herself at our regular come-and-go surgery suite approximately one hour before the scheduled procedure, having been prohibited any oral intake since the previous midnight. Aspiration abortion was then performed, either under light general anesthesia or intravenous analgesia plus paracervical block. A standard aspiration apparatus was used together with the Vibrodilator.† The patient was then observed in the postanesthesia recovery room until fully ambulatory and then returned home—always accompanied by some relative or friend.

Significant aspects of this procedure are as follows: Mean time spent on the hospital premises for the 55 patients was 3.4 hr (range, 1.1–5.4 hr). Fifty patients with similarly conducted inhospital abortions had a mean hospital stay of 37 hr (range, 11–54 hr). Mean measured blood loss at operation was 25 ± 6 ml (range, 20–125 ml) under paracervical block, whereas under light general anesthesia it was 66 ± 15 ml (range, 20–350 ml). Earlier studies had shown that Fluothane tends to double the blood loss at aspiration abortion, so this gas was never used. The operative procedure for patients under general anesthesia required approximately 30 min, whereas for those under paracervical block, it increased to about 50 min because of the time required for the analgesia and for the block to "take." Moreover, the time required for the patient with a paracervical block to recover fully from the somewhat heavier analgesia tended to prolong her stay in the recovery room.

Of greatest interest, of course, is a consideration of complications incidental to this methodology. There were none at operation, although, in 3 patients, difficulty in accomplishing cervical dilatation dictated abandonment of the outpatient procedure and admission to hospital for the abortion. It seems advisable not to undertake come-and-go aspiration abortion in patients with very firm, tight cervices.

Eight of the 55 patients were seen later in the emergency room for postabortal complications: postabortal bleeding (5), mild endometritis (2), and subacute salpingitis (1). Of these, 3 were admitted to hospital for 2-day stays. Of 50 patients with inpatient abortions, 7 had comparable postabortal complications and 2 were similarly readmitted to hospital. Of greatest significance is the fact that none of these post-abortal complications—all of which were handled with minimal therapy—developed earlier than 2 days after abortion, and most occurred from 3 to 30 days after the procedure. So, it is important to emphasize that the conventional 12- to 48-hour hospital admission for aspiration abortion patients serves no real purpose either in preventing or discovering postabortal complications. This fact alone speaks strongly for the feasibility and desirability of accomplishing early abortion as a come-and-go outpatient procedure—provided that the circumstances, auspices and skills brought to bear are of the highest quality.

In the light of our own experience, we feel that this methodology for legal abortion should be given extensive trial in the hope of minimizing the logistic problems created by our mounting abortion rates.

ON THE HEALTHINESS OF FOUR THOUSAND ABORTIONS IN A FREE STANDING ABORTION SERVICE

Horace Hale Harvey, III, M.D.

Barbara Yarnell Elizabeth Pyle

We would first like to thank the people of New York, their legislators, and the Public Health Board for a law and a policy that allows for improvement and self-correction. This is a great moral step necessary to remove the fear of abortion.

We would next like to thank the National Clergy Consultation Service on Abortion (especially Reverend Howard Moody and Arlene Carmen) and the five hundred clergymen throughout the United States who with their pioneering spirit have led the way in the concept of abortion reform. Planned Parenthood is likewise to be commended for its stand on this issue.

Lastly, we would like to offer a heartfelt thanks to the doctors working with us, the nurse-counselors, and to the entire staff of the Community Sex Information and Education Service. Our efforts and dreams would have come to nothing without your hard work and loyalty.

INTRODUCTION

New York is to be commended for leading the country in the repeal of abortion laws. The new law provides that a physician can perform an abortion under conditions that are healthy and safe on a consenting woman up to the twenty-fourth week of pregnancy. This law will inevitably become the model after which the rest of the country will pattern its laws when the reform becomes nationwide. As the New York law will become the model, so will New York's applications of this law. It is to the betterment of these future ends that we do hereby present this report.

The Community Sex Information and Education Service (hereinafter called CSI) is a not-for-profit incorporation devoted to developing nationwide sex education. In July of this year, the National Office of CSI recognized the need for there to be a quality control on the means whereby women in New York receive abortions. This conclusion was reached based upon the many phone calls that poured into our office and into the office of the Clergy and Lay Advocates for Hospital Abortion Performance complaining of the abusive treatment and the exploitive prices by many of the doctors, the profiteering referral agencies, and the hospitals performing abortions in the metropolitan area.

With the tripartite goal of safety, price control, and psychological health, CSI formed Women's Medical Group to act as a consumer control for women seeking abortions in the first ten weeks of pregnancy. Women's Medical Group is able to monitor the safety of the procedure by setting standards for the equipment and the methods, by supervising the participating doctors and by having a comprehensive follow up program consisting of a Women's Medical Group "hot line" telephone number making available to the women 24 hours a day, a doctor or a Registered nurse to answer any questions relating to the procedure or to their condition following the procedure. With these means, and a medical questionnaire completed and returned by the patient ten days later, Women's Medical Group is able to evaluate the participating doctors, and thereby offer the patients a safe procedure.

Women's Medical Group has been able to control abortion pricing since July 1, for slightly over 4,000 abortions by referring only to doctors who have agreed to charge a reasonable fair price, and who have also agreed to perform 25% of the procedures at no charge at all to welfare and indigent patients. The third goal of CSI, psychological health, is perhaps the factor that makes Women's Medical Group so unusual. To achieve this goal, the Group furnishes counselors who work closely with the doctors performing the abortions. The majority of these counselors are registered nurses who have had abortions themselves, and are therefore naturally sensitive to the complicated feelings and reactions that an abortion evokes in a woman. In addition, these nurses have received special training to enable them to deal with the varied psychological aspects and impacts of abortion.

To the furtherment of these three goals, and to the further help of the women of New York, we offer these statistics on the healthiness of 4,000 abortions performed by a free standing abortion service.

For operational details of Women's Medical Group, please see the attached appendix.

Abortion safety is usually measured by comparing the rates of the following medical complications which are often associated with abortions: death, shock, bleeding, infection, perforation, and incomplete abortion.

A) In four thousand abortions performed since July 1 using a local anesthetic, there have been no deaths and no cases of shock or cardiac arrest. This perfect record should be contrasted with the death rates ranging from two to five per one hundred thousand cases, which have occurred in the European and New York hospitals due to the use of general anesthesia for early abortions. The only abortion death in London last year was due to general anesthesia.

B) The bleeding varied from only a few drops in four to six week pregnancies to an average of about one ounce for cases eight to ten weeks pregnant. One ounce is the amount of blood loss a woman ordinarily has during a normal period. However, in our four thousand cases we also had three women who unexpectedly turned out to be ten to twelve weeks pregnant and who lost about a pint of blood during the abortion. This does not represent a serious blood loss, since one pint of blood is the usual amount of blood given during a blood donation to a blood bank. We also had one patient who was sixteen weeks pregnant and who lost about two pints of blood. No woman required a blood transfusion or intravenous fluids. It is important to note that all four of these women were found unexpectedly to be over ten weeks pregnant, thus we have every reason to believe that no woman who is less than ten weeks pregnant will bleed on an average more than she does with a normal period, and the earlier the abortion the less the blood loss. Independent research (Obstetrics and Gynecology, September-1970) has shown that abortions done in hospitals with general anesthesia result in about twice the blood loss of abortions done with local anesthesia. This is probably because general anesthesia prevents uterine contraction which normally would prevent bleeding.

C) Fever and Infection - We had four patients of the one thousand five hundred and sixty who returned our research form, who reported they had fever of 100.4 degrees or more for one day or more. In two of these cases the fever returned to normal in two days, while in two other cases the fever returned to normal in three days. None of these patients with fever required hospitalization.

D) Perforated Uterus - This is the condition resulting when an abortion instrument goes through the uterine muscle wall. We have had nine such cases in four thousand abortions. However, eight of these cases occurred during the first two thousand abortions, whereas only one of these nine cases occurred during the second two thousand cases. This indicates that as the physicians gain experience and become more skilled, they are less likely to perforate a uterus. In fact, the one later perforation was by one of the newer and less experienced physicians (and in a ten and one half week pregnancy).

Thus, we have every reason to believe that uterine perforation can be eliminated as doctors gain skill at doing early abortions. Of the first eight perforations, only three were hospitalized. Two of these hospitalizations were found to be fifteen weeks pregnant. There was only one out of seven perforations in pregnancies less than ten weeks which required hospitalization. Therefore, perforations of such early pregnancies are not as serious a complication as it has been thought to be in the past, since none of these had later complications. All three of our hospitalizations were discharged without complications within three or four days.

E) Incomplete Abortion - We have had one such case wherein the physician suspected in advance that he had not completed the abortion, because he found no pregnancy tissue when he examined the tissue removed from the uterus. (We require that physicians examine all tissues removed from the uterus to make certain that they have removed the entire pregnancy.) In this case, since the patient was only four or five weeks pregnant, the physician could not be sure that he completed the abortion, since in such an early pregnancy there is little or no tissue to be found. Thus, we asked this patient to have another pregnancy test done by us two weeks later. This test proved positive, so the abortion was completed immediately without complications. Let us now compare the complication rates of these 4,000 abortions with those rates of complications in New York hospitals' early abortions. This data is summarized as follows:

Complication	N.Y. Hospitals % Less Than 12 Weeks	WMG Gross % All Cases	WMG Correct % Less Than 12 We
Hemorrhage	.2	.1	.0
Infection	.2	.2	.2
Perforation	.2	.2	.1
Others	.4	.025	.025
	1.0%	.525%	.325%

The third column above is corrected in the sense that in it we have removed all abortion cases of 12 week or more pregnancies, since this was done in the above hospital data. Comparing the above complication rates suggest that Women's Medical Group has had about one-third to one-half the overall complication rate of the New York hospitals. Since the number of these complications is so small in both Women's Medical Group and New York hospitals, the most important fact is that the New York hospitals have had deaths whereas Women's Medical Group has had none. Generally, from this data it can be concluded that early abortions (or abortions less than 12 week pregnancies) are very safe and free from serious medical complications, whether or not they are done in a free standing abortion service such as Women's Medical Group or in a hospital, just as long as no general anesthetic is used. In fact, from the point of view of medical techniques and safety, an early abortion is similar to having a tooth pulled - both usually involve the use of a local anesthetic, both usually involve very little loss of blood, both can easily be done relatively quickly on an ambulatory basis (e.g., during a lunch hour), both have similar "non-fatal" complications and dangers which occur in the range of one per each thousand cases. Thus, in view of the new evidence of the safety of abortion done in free standing abortion services, it would seem hard to justify more medical precautions for an abortion than we require for having a tooth pulled.

Aspiration abortion without cervical dilation

SADJA GOLDSMITH, M.D.
ALAN J. MARGOLIS, M.D.
San Francisco, California

Aspiration abortions on 67 conscious patients with pregnancies of 10 weeks' duration or less were performed successfully without cervical dilation and with minimal risk of perforation, with the use of a 6 mm. diameter flexible plastic cannula. Four other women required slight dilation of the cervix to complete the abortion. There was no significant morbidity in any patient. This simple technique should be useful in future large-scale abortion programs in licensed clinics.

WHILE ASPIRATION ABORTION is accepted widely as a safe and effective technique, any modification is important which will make the procedure more simple, more safe, and less time-consuming without sacrificing completeness of uterine evacuation. Also, if performed without anesthesia or only with paracervical block, an anesthesiologist need not be in attendance and the morbidity of general anesthesia is not incurred.

Although it has been customary to use a cannula whose outside diameter in millimeters is equal to the duration of pregnancy in weeks,[1] evacuation can often be effected without dilation.[2] Such a technique shortens the procedure, decreases discomfort in the conscious patient, and decreases risk of cervical injury.

Our study was conducted to test the efficacy of a flexible 6 mm. diameter plastic aspiration cannula* (Fig. 1) developed by Harvey Karman to remove early first-trimester products of conception. This flexible cannula has two openings at its tip which permit bending without blockage if it is applied to the uterine fundus.

Procedure

Seventy-two pregnant women whose last menses had occurred 10 weeks or less earlier were selected only on the basis of their willingness to be aborted while awake.

Preliminary procedures† included a medical and psychosocial history, physical examination, routine laboratory studies, Rh-antibody screening, and cervical culture for gonorrhea. The abortions were performed on a come-and-go basis at this medical center in a small surgical room attached to an operating suite. Many patients received an oral analgesic one hour before the procedure, while others had no premedication.

A medium Graves speculum was used to expose the cervix, which was then fixed with a tenaculum. A paracervical block was performed by injecting 4 ml. of one per cent lidocaine at each of 4 sites (3, 5, 7, 9 o'clock) 1 cm. deep to the vaginal fornix. The operator cleaned the cervix and vagina with povidone-iodine solution while waiting for the block to become effective. The uterus was sounded to verify its depth and confirm its inclination. The 6 mm. cannula was then passed to the fundus and, while negative pressure (60 to 70 cm. Hg) was applied, it was moved within the uterus to aspirate all parts of the cavity. The duration of aspiration was timed and the procedure was concluded when the uterine walls seemed closely applied to the cannula.

Completeness of evacuation was checked by exploring the uterine cavity with a small curette. When aspiration through the 6 mm. cannula did not produce sufficient tissue, the cervix was dilated to 8 or 9 mm. and a larger aspirator was used to ensure total tissue removal. All specimens were examined to confirm the presence of the products of conception, then sent to the pathology laboratory. Aspirated blood and amniotic fluid were also measured. The patient was discharged within an hour, with an appointment for a 2 week postabortion visit.

During the procedure, each patient was attended by a counselor who explained the procedure and gave encouragement and support.

Results

Of the 72 women (Table I), aspiration abortion was completely successful in 67; 4 required cervical dilation and a larger cannula to empty the uterus. In 1 primigravida the internal os could not be identified by probe or small dilator. The procedure was stopped, and 2 weeks later abortion was performed without difficulty under general anesthesia. Mean aspiration time for the 67 successful cases was 3 minutes (range 1 to 7 minutes), and blood loss averaged 38 ml. (range 10 to 170 ml.).

Fig. 1. The 6 mm. flexible cannula with connecting tubing showing the double opening and a band marking 10 to 12 cm. from the tip.

No patient presented any evidence of a morbid, febrile postabortal course. One patient was observed in the hospital after abortion because products of conception were not positively identified in the pathology laboratory and a diagnosis of ectopic pregnancy was considered but not confirmed. Another patient was seen 7 days postabortion in the emergency ward with the sudden onset of uterine bleeding. She was sent home with a diagnosis of nonsignificant bleeding from the organizing placental site. Five patients telephoned with minor questions which required reassurance only.

Seventy of the 72 women were seen at the 2 week postabortion checkup; the other 2 verified by telephone that they had no problems.

Comment

Abortions performed on healthy women, many of whom are young primigravidas, require meticulous scrutiny and safeguards to minimize early as well as late morbidity and death. There are several obvious advantages in performing early abortions without general anesthesia or cervical dilation. By avoiding general anesthesia, a small but definite risk is eliminated and the procedure is more economical of medical personnel and cost. Without cervical dilation, the conscious patient experiences primarily the cramps of terminal uterine spasm of short duration as the products of conception are completely removed. For this, the patient is amenable to verbal support and the encouragement of being able to leave the unit promptly and in full possession of her faculties.

Avoidance of cervical dilation eliminates the risk of perforation with a dilator. It may also decrease the incidence of premature delivery in subsequent pregnancies, an abortion sequela discussed by Klinger.[3]

At our institution,[4] the most significant morbidity in a large series of first-trimester induced abortions was related to occasional uterine perforation and possible bowel complications. The ease with which the 6 mm. cannula tip bends without blocking aspiration diminishes this risk of perforation.

Early abortion without cervical dilation appears to be a safe and simple enough procedure to be used on a mass basis for early interruption of unwanted pregnancy. With well-qualified personnel who are careful to accept only pregnancies early in the first trimester, and who perform the aspiration technique skillfully, out-of-hospital abortion in well-equipped, licensed facilities seems feasible.

ABORTION UNDER PARACERVICAL BLOCK

A. JEFFERSON PENFIELD, M.D., F.A.C.O.G.
Syracuse, New York

Medical Director, Planned Parenthood of Syracuse, Inc., and Assistant Professor, Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology, Upstate Medical Center

The author performed more than 600 first-trimester abortions by dilatation and suction and instrumental curettage under paracervical block as an outpatient procedure. Premedication, systemic narcotics, intravenous fluids, and oxytocic agents were found unnecessary. Pain relief and cervical relaxation were good with lidocaine used alone. The only complications were 2 cases of low-grade fever and uterine tenderness four to five days postoperatively subsiding after twenty-four hours of antibiotic therapy, and 3 patients who later required standard curettage because of retained products after initial suction curettage. Gynecologists can lessen their dependence on inpatient hospital facilities by adopting the technic, which is suitably performed in any well equipped office.

Is abortion a justifiable back-up method of birth control? With the July 1, 1970, enactment of the New York State Abortion Law, the Legislature gave an affirmative answer. Now any woman in New York State can legally contract with a physician to terminate her pregnancy up to the twenty-fourth week. Pressures are mounting in other states for repeal or reform of their abortion laws.

Greater efforts, of course, must be made in the field of birth control. Let us help our patients prevent unwanted pregnancies. When we fail, however, and are asked to terminate these pregnancies, some of us at least must be prepared to perform safe surgical abortions.

The author's experience with more than 600 patients aborted between November, 1969, and April, 1971, has convinced him that pregnancies under twelve weeks duration may be safely and painlessly terminated by dilatation and curettage under paracervical anesthesia. Both standard and suction curettage technics were used. In no instance was hospitalization necessary.

Review of literature

A number of papers have appeared in American and European journals on outpatient dilatation and curettage for diagnostic purposes, for completion of incomplete abortions, and for therapeutic abortions. Israel and Mazer[1] reported in 1938 on their experience with 305 patients on whom they performed office curettage for abnormal bleeding. In every case satisfactory tissue for diagnosis was obtained; and, except for one perforation without adverse consequence and one "mild infection," no significant complications were reported. Credit was given to Howard Kelly, M.D., who advocated this procedure in 1924.

Despite these authoritative reports on the advantage of office curettage, the past thirty years have seen the great majority of these procedures performed in hospital operating rooms under general anesthesia. This routine is appropriate for the very anxious patient who cannot relax sufficiently to be examined properly awake, but hospitalization for curettage is unnecessary for the great majority of patients.

In the past ten years there has been renewed interest in performing dilatation and curettage procedures in the outpatient department or in the well-equipped gynecologist's office. Mengert and Slate in 1960[2] reported on diagnostic dilatation and curettage as an outpatient procedure on 403 patients. Benzalkonium 1:100,000 was used to wash the vagina, and gloves were not used. A self-retaining retractor was employed, and 10 to 20 cc. of 1 per cent aqueous procaine were instilled into each paracervical area. Satisfactory anesthesia was obtained in all cases, and the single complication of significance was a drop of blood pressure to 60/45 in one elderly patient immediately after injection of the anesthetic. The pressure returned to normal promptly with the aid of pressor drugs. In 1964 Connar and Bepko[3] reported on 605 cases of dilatation and curettage for incomplete abortion under pudendal and paracervical block. Ten cc. of mepivacaine 1 per cent were deposited in each paracervical area at 4:00 and 8:00 o'clock. All patients received premedication, usually sodium pentobarbital and scopolamine. Satisfactory anesthesia was obtained in 604 of 605 patients. There were no major complications.

In 1967 Van Praagh and Povey[4] reported on paracervical block for dilatation and curettage in 176 patients from fifteen to fifty-five years of age, including cases of dysfunctional bleeding, incomplete and septic abortions, postpartum hemorrhage, and therapeutic abortions. There were no recognized complications. Good pain relief was obtained in 168, fair relief in 4, and poor relief in 4. The 8 unsatisfactory effects were thought to be due to poor placement of the anesthetic, for all occurred during the first weeks of the study as the technic was being perfected. In 1969 Jorgensen[5] reported on paracervical block in curettage for diagnostic purposes and for abortion in 373 patients. Using pethidine as premedication, a satisfactory analgesic effect was observed in 90 per cent of the patients. The only serious side-effect noted was transient shock in a seventy-three-year-old patient, whose blood pressure fell from 170/100 to 70/40 immediately after the injection of 18 ml. of leoste-sin-noradrenaline 1 per cent in the paracervical tissues. No change in consciousness occurred. A few minutes after she had received oxygen and dextran, her blood pressure returned to normal.

Thus, out of a total of 1,862 patients reported who had dilatation and curettage under paracervical block, there was not a single serious complication resulting from the procedure. Satisfactory analgesia was obtained in well over 90 per cent of the cases.

In recent years, suction or aspiration curettage has become the method of choice for uterine evacuation, particularly in women more than six weeks following conception. Initial aspiration of uterine contents may be accomplished in less than three minutes, and is usually accompanied by very little bleeding. It is advisable to follow this up, nonetheless, with standard instrumental curettage to clean out adherent fragments or loosened decidua. Extensive experience with this method was reported by three investigators at the April, 1970, meeting of the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians.[6-8]

Patients

In the twelve-month period between November 1, 1969, and November 1, 1970, the author personally performed 291 first-trimester abortions, all as outpatient procedures under paracervical block. Of these, 187 were performed in the Planned Parenthood Center, and 104 in the author's private office.

The following analysis of the first 147 cases is representative of the series as a whole. The average age of patients was twenty-four years, with the oldest patient being forty-six and the youngest fourteen years. Patients' marital status was: single, 84; married, 49; divorced, 8; separated, 4; and widowed, 2.

The duration of pregnancy from assumed date of conception (add two weeks if standard nomenclature used) is shown in Table I.

The estimated blood loss from onset of procedure to one hour postoperative was: 10 to 20 cc., 33 patients; 20 to 50 cc., 70 patients; 50 to 100 cc., 35 patients; and 100 to 200 cc., 9 patients.

Patients presented themselves either on their own initiative or were referred from private physicians, the Clergy Consultation Service, or Planned Parenthood. All patients were examined by the author or by another gynecologist between one day and three weeks before the procedure. Whenever appropriate, the patient's husband, family, or boy friend were consulted to be certain that alternative solutions to these "problem pregnancies" had been explored. If the patient and other involved persons reached a firm decision in favor of pregnancy termination, the procedure was scheduled as soon as convenient.

Procedure

The patient arrived, preferably after a good night's sleep, having had no food or water for at least eight hours. The first 30 patients all received premedication consisting of narcotics, tranquilizers, or sedatives. Many of them, however, experienced the side-effects of nausea, drowsiness, and dizziness. During the next several months the patients received no premedication, and there was no apparent increase in apprehension or discomfort.

With each of the first 50 patients, an intravenous solution of 5 per cent dextrose in water containing 40 units (4 cc.) of oxytocin was run in rapidly during the procedure. None of the remaining patients has received any intravenous fluids or any oxytocic agents, and there has been no increase in uterine blood loss nor any detectable difference in uterine tone.

Preoperatively the patient's pulse and blood pressure were taken. A repeat pelvic examination was done to confirm uterine size and position and to rule out any infection or abnormalities. A large bivalve speculum was then inserted and the vagina and cervix thoroughly cleansed with three separate scrubs of full-strength povidone-iodine solution (Betadine), taking care to rotate the speculum so as to reach every portion of the vagina.

The cervix was then grasped with a single-tooth tenaculum, and gentle traction applied to expose the posterior vault of the vagina. Xylocaine hydrochloride (Lidocaine) 1 per cent with 1:100,000 epinephrine was then injected through a 20-gauge 4-inch hypodermic needle whose point lay about ½ cm. beyond the vaginal mucosa (Fig. 2). Eight cc. were deposited at 4:00 o'clock and 8 cc. at 8:00 o'clock to block the uterovaginal plexus of Frankenhauser, a cluster of ganglia in the uterosacral region just lateral to the internal cervical os. This solution blocks all the sensory nerves from the uterus which run from the uterosacral ligament areas into the pelvic and hypogastric plexuses.

Recently the author has produced more consistent total cervical anesthesia and greater internal os relaxation by injecting 5 cc. each at 4:00 and 8:00 o'clock and 3 cc. each at 2:00 and 10:00 o'clock. The plunger of the syringe was withdrawn slightly before and two to four times during the administration of the lidocaine at each site. No patient received more than 20 cc. of the anesthetic solution.

The patient was allowed to rest for three to five minutes to allow for diffusion of the anesthetic and to detect any adverse reaction to the lidocaine. Surgical masks, sterile gloves, and sterile instruments were used. The operator straightened the cervicouterine angle and gently sounded the uterus, carefully ascertaining the direction of the cervical canal and the location of the internal os. Hegar dilators were then introduced, beginning with number 2 (2 mm.). Extreme care and gentleness were practiced during the dilatation (Fig. 3). For pregnancies under six weeks, dilatation beyond number 8 Hegar was found to be unnecessary. If over eight weeks, and if the suction curet was to be used, dilatation up to number 13 Hegar (13 mm.) was usually accomplished without difficulty, even in the primigravida patient. An advantage of paracervical over general anesthesia is that it does relax the internal os and therefore facilitates dilatation. Most patients found this part of the procedure entirely painless.

Following dilatation of the cervix, uterine evacuation was then accomplished usually by the suction method, utilizing hollow plastic curets of varying diameters, attached by means of rigid plastic tubing to a two-bottle aspiration apparatus, whose motor was capable of producing a negative pressure throughout the system of 25 to 30 inches of mercury.* Following uterine aspiration, sharp instrumental curettage was employed in all patients to clean out remaining fragments of the ovum.

In the majority of instances the site of embryonic implantation was found to be on the posterior or posterolateral wall of the uterus. The uterine corpus invariably contracted down well during the procedure, regardless of whether or not an oxytocic agent was administered. When the operator had gained sufficient experience, the actual time required for curettage was never more than ten minutes. About one half of the patients admitted to some cramps during the completion of the curettage, but in no instance was the pain sufficient to justify the use of narcotics or general anesthesia.

*Emerson's Uterine Aspirator, Emerson Division, Vernitron Medical Products, Carlstadt, New Jersey.

Each patient rested for one hour following the procedure, and then returned home with her escort. She was instructed to rest at home for the remainder of the day, and was able to resume normal activities the next day. Antibiotics were not prescribed. If there were a risk of exposure to pregnancy, birth-control pills were started immediately. However, patients were encouraged to refrain from intercourse until their one-month follow-up visit.

Some of these patients have now been followed as long as eleven months postoperatively. All of those followed more than six weeks resumed normal menstruation, and there have been no repeat unplanned pregnancies in this group. In general, the patients have expressed gratitude and satisfaction concerning the decision to terminate pregnancy and the method used.

Comment

Complications which one might expect from this procedure include: reaction to the local anesthetic, laceration of the cervix, uterine perforation, hemorrhage, and infection.

Three patients who had suction curettage at ten weeks required a standard curettage between one and three weeks later because of retained products. With increasing experience and better technic such a complication should be rare.

Two patients developed low-grade fever and uterine tenderness four to five days postoperatively. They were treated with a broad spectrum antibiotic, ampicillin trihydrate (Polycillin), and after twenty-four hours their fever and discomfort disappeared. These 5 are the only patients out of the entire series of 291 who experienced significant complications.

The set-up for outpatient abortion must nonetheless include safeguards for the management of any of the complications listed. The following should be available in case of drug reactions: oxygen; vasopressors, such as levarterenol bitartrate (Levophed bitartrate injection), dosage 4 cc. per 1,000 cc. 5 per cent dextrose in water; and anticonvulsants, such as diazepam (Valium injectable) 10 mg. intravenously. Intravenous fluids should be at hand, and there should be access to blood, particularly packed red cells. Rh negative patients are candidates for Rho (D) immune globulin (Rhogam) administration.

Summary

A review of the world literature has demonstrated that dilatation and curettage under paracervical block is a safe and usually painless procedure.

The author's series of more than 600 first-trimester surgical abortions has also shown the acceptability of this technic when performed in a well equipped outpatient or office facility.

Gynecologists must not only offer better birth control, but also must prepare themselves to meet the requests for abortion. They must learn to lessen their dependence on inpatient hospital facilities, and accept the challenge of outpatient surgical abortion under paracervical block.

On Appeal From the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas.

Motion for Leave to File Brief Amici Curiae in Support of Appellants.

The National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor, the National Welfare Rights Organization and the American Public Health Association hereby respectfully move the Court for leave to file their attached brief amici curiae in support of appellants in the above-entitled matter.

The National Legal Program on Health Problems of the Poor is a law reform center funded by the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity to provide support for OEO Legal Services programs across the country in cases involving health problems of the poor, and to provide, through education, research and legal representation, assistance in the preparation of important litigation in health law. In that capacity, the Program participated as amicus curiae in this case in the court below. The Program is based at UCLA School of Law.

The National Welfare Rights Organization is a voluntary association with 125,000 members in 50 states, organized to represent the interests of low income people and welfare recipients with regard to redress of legal grievances, to act as a spokesman for such people and to educate and inform them of their legal rights.

The American Public Health Association is a voluntary Association of professionals and others in the field of health care who are concerned about improving the quality and the means of providing for the health care of the American people. The APHA works to identify and study these problems, and to communicate its concerns to the government and the public.

These organizations share the view that restrictive state abortion laws, such as the Texas statute here under review, have a negative effect on the health and well-being of American women, and have a particularly severe impact on the nation's poor and non-white populations. It is the poor and non-white who suffer most from limited access to legal abortion, and it is they who incur greatly disproportionate numbers of deaths and crippling injuries as a result of being forced to seek criminal abortion.

There are a number of grounds for constitutional challenge to the abortion law here under review. Amici request leave to file this brief at the invitation of counsel for appellants, in order to present in some depth the argument that the discriminatory application and effect of the abortion law denies to the poor and non-white the equal protection of the law.

It is the understanding and belief of amici and this argument will not be developed in any detail in the principal briefs for appellants, and that appellants rely on the within brief for this purpose. Therefore, the equal protection analysis and issues raised in this brief will not be repetitious of other arguments.

BRIEF OF AMICI CURIAE.

Summary of Argument.

A woman who seeks an abortion is asserting certain fundamental rights which are protected by the Constitution. Among these are the rights to marital and family privacy, to individual and sexual privacy; in sum, the right to choose whether to bear children or not. These rights are abridged by the state's restriction of abortions to saving the mother's life. To justify such an abridgment, the state must demonstrate a compelling interest; no such compelling interest exists to save the Texas abortion law.

The state's interest in protecting the woman's health no longer supports restrictions on abortion. Medical science now performs abortions more safely than it brings a woman through pregnancy and childbirth. Any state interest in discouraging non-marital sexual relationships must be served by laws penalizing these relationships, and not be an indirect, overly broad prohibition on abortion. There is no evidence, in any case, that abortion laws deter such sexual relationships. The state's purported interest in expanding the population lacks any viability today; government policy in every other area is now squarely against it. And any purported interest in permitting all embryos to develop and be born is not supported anywhere in the Constitution or any other body of law.

Because of its restriction, the Texas statute, denies to poor and non-white women equal access to legal abortions. It is an undeniable fact that abortion in Texas and in virtually every other state in the United States is far more readily available to the white, paying patient than to the poor and the non-white. Studies by physicians, sociologists, public health experts, and lawyers all reach this same conclusion. The reasons for it are not purely economic, i.e., that because abortion is an expensive commodity to obtain on the medical marketplace, it is therefore to be expected that the rich will have greater access to it. It is also because in the facilities which provide health care to the poor, abortion is simply not made available to the poor and non-white on the same conditions as it is to paying patients. As a result, the poor resort to criminal abortion, with its high toll of infection and death, in vastly disproportionate numbers.

Largely to blame are restrictive abortion laws, such as the Texas statute, in which the legislature has made lay judgments about what conditions must exist before abortions can be legally performed, and has delegated the authority to make such decisions to physicians and committees of physicians with the threat of felony punishment if they err on the side of granting abortion. Unlike more privileged women, poor and non-white women are unable to shop for physicians and hospitals sympathetic to their applications, cannot afford the necessary consultations to establish that their conditions qualify them for treatment, and must largely depend on public hospitals and physicians with whom they have no personal relationship, and who operate under the government's eye, for the relief they seek. The resulting discrimination is easily demonstrated.

Restricting abortion only to treatment necessary to save the mother's life irrationally excludes those classes of women for whom abortion is necessary for the protection of health, or because they will bear a deformed fetus, or who are pregnant due to sexual assault, or who are financially, socially or emotionally incapable of raising a child or whose families would be seriously disrupted by the birth of another child, and these exclusions bear most heavily on the poor and non-white.

In the absence of any compelling state interest, the harsh discriminatory effect on the poor and the non-white resulting from the operation of the Texas abortion law denied to poor and non-white women the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

ARGUMENT.

I.

The Texas Abortion Law Infringes Upon the Right to Marital and Individual Privacy Without a Compelling State Interest.

A. The Statute Infringes Upon the Right to Privacy.

The right to privacy has been recognized as a constitutionally protected right. The Texas abortion statute (Tex. Pen. Code, Arts. 1191 et seq.) infringes on the right to marital privacy and the woman's right to individual privacy.

1. Marital Privacy.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, this Court recognized the right to marital privacy when the Court voided a state statute prohibiting dissemination of contraceptive information and devices. The Court defined the right to privacy in terms of the right to personal solitude and autonomy and applied it to a "zone of privacy in marriage," thereby setting forth a right that may not be disturbed by the state without a compelling and valid interest.

The explicit recognition in Griswold of a right of marital privacy is but one decision in a line of decisions, dating over fifty years, giving constitutional protection to various rights in the procreative, marital and family context, none of which is explicitly enumerated in the Bill of Rights. These decisions include Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 536 ("the right to have offspring" is a constitutionally protected "human right"); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 534-535 (the right to send one's children to private school is derived from "the liberty of parents and guardians to direct the upbringing and education of children under their control"); and Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399 (the liberty guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment denotes "the right of the individual to . . . marry, establish a home and bring up children"). More recently, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 12, specifically held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects "the freedom to marry . . . as one of the vital personal rights essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men".

Recognition of the right of privacy asserted in the case now before the Court thus would not usher in a vast increase in judicial power. What has been said pertaining to Griswold applies here:

> It required no judicial roving at large to reach the conclusion that the freedom of the marital relationship is a part of the bundle of rights associated with home, family, and marriage—rights supported by precedent, history and common understanding. . . . In exercising its power in Griswold to protect a fundamental personal liberty, the Court, far from advancing to a new milepost on the high road of judicial supremacy, was treading a worn and familiar path. Kauper, "Penumbras, Peripheries, Emanations, Things Fundamental and Things Forgotten: The Griswold case," 64 Mich. L. Rev. 235, 258 (1965).

This Court, in Griswold, endorsed the contention that certain areas of one's life are so personal that they are nobody else's business; that there is a right to simply withdraw into personal intimacy without hindrance by the State, and a right to protection of this private sphere. Without any "invasion" of the marital bedchamber, and without any attempt by the state to obtain incriminating evidence, the Court held the Connecticut statute to be an invasion of the protected "zone of marital privacy." Surely, the State has no interest in invading the sanctity, or privacy, of any other decisions involving family planning.

> Griswold's act was to prevent formation of the fetus. This, the court found, was constitutionally protected. If an individual may prevent conception, why can he not nullify that conception when prevention has failed? Clark, "Religion, Morality, and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal," 2 Loyola U. (L.A.) L. Rev. 1, 9 (Apr. 1969).

The Texas statute, by prohibiting abortions except to save the mother's life abolishes the married couple's fundamental right to decide whether or not to bear a child at the instant when an ovum is fertilized. Until that moment, the couple has complete freedom of choice as to when, whether, and how often they shall produce children. But once fertilization occurs, their freedom of choice ends and they may no longer choose not to have a child. The state thus invades, and even supersedes, a married couple's constitutional right to control the use of their procreative powers. Under Griswold it is surely not the means of control, but the power to control which is significant.

The existence and enforcement of this statute allows the state to intrude into the very essence of the marital relationship and indeed to affect the very course and fate of the marriage itself. As did the Connecticut anti-contraceptive statute, the Texas abortion statute unconstitutionally "operates directly on an intimate relation of husband and wife." 381 U.S. at 483.

2. The Right of Privacy of the Individual Woman.

The right to privacy, to seclusion and autonomy, established as to married couples in Griswold, supra, surely belongs to individuals as well.

The right of a woman to control her own body, specifically whether or not to continue a pregnancy, is inherent in the decision in Terry v. Ohio, 393 U.S. 1, 8-9, that "no right is more sacred . . . than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person. . . ." See also Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 478 (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

The right of the woman to decide whether to terminate an unwanted pregnancy follows inexorably from the broad principle that she is entitled to be "let alone" by the state and its agents. For a state to adopt such provisions as the State of Texas has done in this statute represents an impermissible intrusion into her right to her personal integrity and is a deprivation of her personal liberty. By compelling her, against her will, to continue a pregnancy, the woman may be risking her physical or mental well-being, acquiring the financial and psychological burden of a handicapped child, subjected to the emotional trauma of bearing and raising a child whose conception was forced upon her by rape or incest, or adversely affecting the essential direction and quality of her own life (and perhaps the lives of others with whom she lives and works, as well). If a woman is viewed as an individual entity, and not as a vessel for propagation, each time she determines whether to bear a child or not, she is without doubt making a truly fundamental choice of her life.

Women are no longer a vehicle for a determination by others that supervening social interests require their frequent childbearing for the purpose of adding to the population. Through the medium of the abortion law, however, they are subject to the determination of society in general, which (so far as the lawmaking process is concerned) is largely male, that no woman may make for herself the decision not to complete a pregnancy to term when she does not desire to. As set out below, the state has no compelling interest in demanding that a woman should carry an unwanted child.

Several courts have acknowledged that the woman's right to her physical integrity requires that she be allowed to make the decision as to the termination of her pregnancy without hindrance by the state. These cases stand for the proposition that abortion statutes are wholly inconsistent with the existence of a right so fundamental in nature, and are, therefore, unconstitutional. In none of these cases was the state's interest in the policy expressed in the challenged abortion statute considered to be of sufficiently compelling nature to justify legislative efforts to circumscribe a woman's right to decide, after consultation with her physician, to terminate her pregnancy.

In People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915, for example, the Supreme Court of California, in striking down as unconstitutional the pre-1967 abortion law of California, stated:

> The rights involved in the instant case are the woman's right to life and to choose whether to bear children. The woman's right to life is involved because childbirth involves risks of death.

> The fundamental right of the woman to choose whether to bear children follows from the Supreme Court's and this Court's repeated acknowledgement of a "right of privacy" or "liberty" in matters related to marriage, family, and sex. 71 Cal. 2d at 963. (footnotes and citations omitted).

See also Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970), appeal dismissed per curiam, 400 U.S. 1, where the Court said:

> The police power of the state does not . . . entitle it to deny to a woman the basic right reserved to her under the Ninth Amendment to decide whether she should carry or reject an embryo which has not yet quickened. 310 F. Supp. at 302.

The right "to be let alone" has, to be sure, been qualified in a few cases involving physical intrusion into the body, but only where the state interest has been compelling, that is, where th exercise of that right has threatened the rights of other members of the society. For example, the power of the state to require vaccinations and to quarantine persons suffering from contagious diseases, although upheld, has been limited to situations involving "great dangers", and "the safety of the general public." Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 29 (1904). In Jacobson, even so minor an infringement of liberty and of the individual's sovereignty over his body as vaccination was held to require a strong justification.

Also supporting the individual's right to control his own body are recent cases which have upheld the individual's right to refuse medical treatment, even though such a refusal will clearly result in death. See, e.g., Erickson v. Dilgard, 44 Misc. 2d 27, 252 N.Y.S. 2d 705 (Nassau County Sup. Ct. 1062); In re Brooks Estate, 32 Ill. 2d 361, 205 N.E. 2d 435 (1965).

In case where blood transfusions were permitted without the patient's consent, Pres. & Directors of Georgetown College, Inc. v. Jones, 231 F. 2d 1000 (D.C. Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 978, the court based its order on two grounds: (1) the state had an interest in preserving the life of a woman whose small child might become a public charge if she died; and (2) the patient was too weak from loss of blood to be capable of making a competent decision. This case was followed in United States v. George, 239 F. Supp. 752 (D. Conn. 1965), in which blood transfusions were ordered while the patient was semiconscious, but withdrawn several days later when the patient regained consciousness.

These cases demonstrate that an individual has a right to refuse medical treatment unless the state's interest is so great that the rest of society will be endangered absent such treatment. Similarly, the state has no right to prevent an individual woman from obtaining medical treatment she desires, where that treatment represents no danger to the community as a whole.

B. The Statute Infringes Upon Fundamental Constitutional Rights Without Serving Any Compelling State Interest.

Where there is a significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling. Bates v. Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524.

The Texas abortion statute does not serve any compelling state interest to justify its infringement upon constitutionally protected rights. The statute does not serve any valid health purpose; instead it causes a severe health problem. The state has no valid interest in regulating morality indirectly through an abortion statute. The state has no valid interest in increasing population through an abortion statute. And the state has no interest in requiring that all embryos develop and be born.

1. The Statute Serves No Health Interest of the State; on the Contrary, It Has Created a Severe Health Problem.

Because a state has a valid interest in protecting the health of its citizens, one frequently-asserted justification for restrictive abortion laws has been the state's concern with preserving the health of the woman because of the medical dangers associated with abortion in the past. Indeed, the history of abortion legislation in the United States shows that such a concern was a primary, if not the sole, reason for the passage of such restrictive laws during the nineteenth century. But current medical knowledge and techniques have drastically reduced the hazards of abortion, and any such state interest has disappeared. Now, pregnancy itself, may be more harmful to woman's health than an abortion performed under medically approved conditions.

Abortion before "quickening" (i.e., when the first fetal movements are felt by the pregnant woman, usually about the fourth or fifth month) was not a crime under the common law of England; even after quickening, abortion was only a misdemeanor. 3 Coke, Insti- tutes 50 (1648). American law followed suit until the nineteenth century, when legislation making abortion prior to quickening a crime began to appear. These new laws were designed to protect the health of the woman. As State v. Murphy, 27 N.J.L. 112, 114 (Sup. Ct. 1858) declared:

> The design of the [abortion] statute was not to prevent the procuring of abortions, so much as to guard the health and life of the mother against the consequences of such attempts.

The risk of even hospital abortions in the 19th century was formidable, but it is now safer for a woman to have a hospital therapeutic abortion during the first trimester than to bear a child. People v. Belous, supra at 965.

> "At the time the abortion laws were passed, the laws made some medical-legal sense. But now, in view of the progress of medical science, these laws . . . make no sense whatsoever." Hall, "Abortion Laws: A Call for Reform," 18 DePaul L. Rev. 584, 585 (1969). The rate of maternal mortality from complications of or associated with pregnancy and childbirth (excluding induced abortion) is 18 deaths per 100,000 live births, while the rate of mortality associated with legal abortions performed in hospitals at an early stage of gestation is three deaths per 100,000 abortions. Tietze, "Mortality with Contraception and Induced Abortions," 45 Studies in Family Planning 6 (Sept. 1969).

There is no longer any health interest served by the Texas abortion statute.

2. The State Has No Valid Interest in Indirectly Legislating Morality, and the Statute Does Not Actually Serve Any Moral Purpose.

It is sometimes asserted that the State has a moral interest in prohibiting abortion because the availability of abortions will tend to encourage promiscuity. If the Texas legislature is concerned with deterring fornication and adultery, it may enforce statutory prohibitions of and penalties for those acts themselves. "It may not do so, however, by making the penalty a personally, and socially, undesired pregnancy." Baird v. Eisenstadt, 429 F. 2d 1398, 1402 (1st Cir. 1970), prob. juris. noted, 401 U.S. 934.

Even where premarital or extramarital relationships are banned, as in Connecticut at the time of the Griswold opinion, a ban on abortions by married couples in no way reinforces the state's ban on other sexual relationships. "At most [such a] broad ban is of marginal utility to the declared objective." Griswold v. Connecticut, supra at 506 (White, J., concurring).

3. The State Has No Interest in Increasing Its Population; on the Contrary, Its Interest, if Any, Is in Limiting Population Growth.

In view of the increasing public concern over our rapidly multiplying population, any supposed state interest in increasing the number of lives in being can hardly be raised as a justification for the prohibition of abortion. Indeed, the growing emphasis of both federal and state agencies upon preplanning of families and limitation of their size makes manifestly inconsistent treating the termination of pregnancy as a crime, while birth control devices are not merely permitted but are openly promoted and encouraged by the government. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. 705(a)(12); 45 C.F.R. 220.20, 220.21.

4. The State Has No Interest in Requiring That All Embryos Develop and Be Born.

There is not now, nor has there ever been, a state interest which requires that all embryos develop and be born.

(a) The Law Has Never Restricted Abortions for the Purpose of Protecting the Embryo.

The English common law, followed in this country until the advent of statutory law, permitted abortion before quickening with the woman's consent. The woman's right to abort her pre-quickened fetus was thus "an ancient commonlaw liberty" of which she was not deprived until the nineteenth century. Means, "The Law of New York Concerning Abortion and the Status of the Foetus, 1664-1968: A Case of Cessation of Constitutionality," 14 N.Y.L.F. 411, 420, 453 (1968).

If anything, the historical development of the abortion statutes reflects an interest in protecting the well-being of the woman. "The new statutes were inspired by reverence for life, to be sure; but the life they revered was the pregnant woman's, not that of the unquickened foetus." Id. at 508.

(b) There Is No Legal Recognition of the Fetus as a Person; Live Birth Is Required Before Any Rights Attach.

All of the statutes and rules which are generally relied upon to show that an embryo or fetus is legally equivalent to a born child "require a live birth or reflect the interest of the parents." People v. Belous, supra at 968, 968 n. 12.

(1) No recovery is permitted for injuries negligently inflicted upon a fetus by a third person unless the fetus is born alive. Prosser, Law of Torts 336 (4th ed. 1971).

(2) No recovery whatsoever is permitted in many states for wrongful death where there is a stillbirth. Even in those jurisdictions which recognize such a cause of action, it is a recognition on behalf of the parents, who have suffered a distressing wrong in the loss of a child whose birth they desired. Id. at 337. Moreover, every one of those cases requires that the injury have occurred when the fetus was viable (one case says "quick"). See 15 A.L.R. 3d 992 (1967).

(3) The fetus has no property rights; it must be born alive to take property. See, e.g., People v. Belous, supra at 968 n. 12.

(c) The View That "Human Life" Commences With Conception Is a Philosophical Conclusion Not Supported by Scientific Evidence.

The view that human life commences with conception cannot be supported by any scientific evidence one way or the other. At what point a fetus becomes a "human being" is a subject more fitting for philosophical debate than for scientific judgment. Precisely because human development is a continuum, any choice of a starting point for an individual human being is largely arbitrary. Choosing the point of fertilization of the egg by the sperm is no more logical or meaningful than choosing any other.

> It is said that, as a biological fact, life begins with the fertlized ovum. But in one sense 'life' began in the prehistoric slime and has been continuous since. The question is not when life begins but when human personality begins. This is where the phrase 'the unborn child' subtly begs the question.

The phrase 'unborn child' can be used, without offense to common sense, in respect of the viable foetus, that if, after about the seventh month of pregnancy, when the foetus is capable of surviving part from the mother. But the further one goes back in the development of the foetus the more questionable its application becomes. Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law 197 (1957).

The existence of a conceptus cannot be equated with the life of a grown woman. This woman is—beyond dispute—a human being. To equate her life and her constitutional rights with those of a non-visable fetus is to make a moral judgment. Any individual is entitled to adopt such a moral judgment for guidance in his or her private life, but it is surely a judgment which he cannot enforce upon others through legislation. See Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97.

5. Conclusion.

A single conclusion is dictated by all of the above: the Texas abortion statute serves no compelling state interest. Because it fails to serve any compelling state interest, its invasion of fundamental rights is in clear violation of the Federal Constitution.

II.

The Application and Effect of Restrictive Abortion Laws, Such as the Texas Abortion Law, Results in Discrimination Against Poor and Non-White Women in Exercising Their Fundamental Interest in Marital and Individual Privacy, Denying to Them the Equal Protection of the Laws.

While amici contend that to receive proper medical care in the form of an abortion approved and performed by a physician is, by itself, a fundamental interest protected by the Constitution (Part I, supra), it is not necessary for abortion to be declared a constitutional right to hold that its discriminatory denial violates guarantees of equal protection. Even when an interest is not found to be fundamental under the Due Process Clause, it may be deemed fundamental under the Equal Protection Clause, and unequal treatment with respect to that interest upheld only on a very strong showing of justification. Note, "Developments in the Law—Equal Protection," 82 Harv. L. Rev. 1065, 1130 (1969).

A. Factual Data Demonstrate Discrimination Against the Poor and Non-White.

The State of Texas has prohibited all abortions except for "the purpose of saving the mother's life" (Tex. Pen. Code, Art. 1196). On its face, this permits treatment in the case of all women whose lives are similarly endangered, and excludes from treatment all others.

Presumably, therefore, those women who qualify for a legal abortion according to the terms of the statute should be able to obtain one, regardless of their race or socio-economic status. There is nothing demonstrable in the differences of skin color or economic condition which suggests that a substantially smaller proportion of the poor or the non-white fall into this category than that of the white and the non-poor, or that the poor and non-white have a substantially different moral attitude on abortion.

On the contrary, a recent study of births occurring between 1960 and 1965 led investigators to conclude that one-third of Negro (as contrasted with one-fifth of white) births were unwanted. "This high level of unwanted births among Negroes indicates the magnitude of the burden of unwanted dependents that is borne by this population. . . ." Blumpass and Westoff, "The Perfect 'contraceptive' Population," 169 Science 1177, 1179 (1970). Unwanted births were in general more than twice as high for families with incomes of less than $3000 as for those with incomes of over $10,000; this differential was "particularly marked among Negroes." Id. The results indicated, in the view of the investigators, that there is a "coincidence of poverty and unwanted births rather than a propensity of the 'poor' to have unwanted children." Id.

One explanation for this high level of unwanted births among the poor and the non-white is surely the fact that they do not have equal access to abortions. Data demonstrate that the poor and the non-white do not receive this medical treatment on the same terms as do others. They thus suffer a particularly harsh and adverse effect from the operation of this statute, as they do from that of the other restrictive abortion laws which have existed and currently exist in the United States. Dr. Alan F. Guttmacher has summed up the evidence:

> Both in regard to incidence and indications between patients on private and clinic services and > voluntary and municipal hospitals . . . it has long been apparent . . that municipal hospitals follow the letter of the law of the abortion statute much more exactly than voluntary hospitals, and also that private patients are generally treated by a more lenient interpretation of the law than service patients. Guttmacher, "Abortion—Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow," in Guttmacher (ed.), The Case for Legalized Abortion Now (1967).

The additional burdens placed upon indigent women by public hospitals before these women can obtain abortions (obtainable with far greater ease elsewhere by those who can pay) have been discussed by the two federal courts which examined the procedures at the District of Columbia General Hospital. Doe v. Gen. Hosp., 313 F. Supp. 1170 (D.D.C. 1970), 434 F. 2d 423 and 434 F. 2d 427 (D.C. Cir. 1970). Because the poor rely primarily upon public hospitals for their medical services, denials or delays at those institutions are tantamount to a denial of prompt medical care solely because these women are without funds.

Dr. Robert E. Hall has collected and reported data supporting this conclusion. In New York City, between 1960 and 1962, Dr. Hall found that:

> . . . the ratio of therapeutic abortions to live births in the proprietary hospitals was 1:250; on the private services of the voluntary hospitals, 1:400; on the ward services of the same voluntary hospitals, 1:1,400; and in the municipal hospitals, 1:10,000. The same inequity pertains to ethnic origin. The rate of therapeutic abortions per live births among white women in New York is 1 per > 380, among nonwhites 1 per 2,000, and among Puerto Ricans 1 per 10,000. Hall, "Abortion in American Hospitals," 57 Am. J. Pub. Health 1933, 1934 (1967).

In a survey of 65 randomly selected major American hospitals, Dr. Hall similarly discovered that the rate of therapeutic abortions was 3.6 times higher on the private services of these hospitals than on their ward services. Hall, "Therapeutic Abortion, Sterilization and Contraception," 91 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 518, 519 (1965).

Kenneth R. Niswander has substantiated similar data from a study of Buffalo, New York, hospitals. Niswander, "Medical Abortion Practices in the United States," in Smith (ed.), Abortion and the Law 53 (1967).

Furthermore, he has written:

> Hospitals vary greatly in their abortion practices. At the Los Angeles County Hospital, which treats only clinic patients, . . . from 1946 to 1951 there was an incidence of one therapeutic abortion per two thousand eight hundred sixty-four (2,864) deliveries. At the opposite extreme, one finds reputable hospitals permitting abortion for one out of every 35-40 deliveries. The variation in the hospitals surveyed by [Robert E.] Hall extended from no abortions in 24,417 deliveries to one in 36 deliveries. It seems inconceivable that medical opinion could vary so widely. Socioeconomic factors must be playing a major role in the decision to abort in certain institutions. Id. at 54-55 (emphasis added).

Data collected from New York City by other investigators for the period 1951-1962 revealed that:

> Therapeutic abortion occur[red] most frequently among the white population by a considerable margin. The white ratio [was] more than five times that among the nonwhites and 26 times that among the Puerto Ricans. (Well over 90 per cent of all therapeutic abortions in New York City [were] performed on white women.) Gold et al., "Therapeutic Abortions in New York City: A 20-Year Review," 55 Am. J. Pub. Health 964, 966 (1965) (emphasis added).

A nationwide survey of all short-term general hospitals participating in the Professional Activities Survey from 1963 to 1965 led to this conclusion:

> . . . [T]he incidence of therapeutic abortion was almost twice as high among white women as among the nonwhite group . . . . Tietze, "Therapeutic Abortions in the United States," 101 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 784, 786 (1968).

Similar statistics and conclusions appear throughout the literature in this area:

> Perhaps the greatest injustice resulting from our standard for private and indigent patients. . . . Almost universally greater consideration is extended to the private patient for a multitude of reasons which, not infrequently, include a recognition of their social and economic prestige. Mandy, "Reflections of a Gynecologist," in Rosen (ed.), Abortion in America 288-89 (1967).

* * *

The rich and the poor, it should be noted, are not treated alike: many ethical physicians, for in> stance, are much more lenient in their application of indications for therapeutic abortion to private patients than to indigent patients on municipal hospital services. It is the 'private practice' patient, therefore, who can more readily obtain a therapeutic abortion. Kleegman, "Planned Parenthood: Its Influence on Public Health and Family Welfare," in Rosen (ed.), Abortion in America 254, 256 (1967).

A partial explanation for the marked disparity in these figures appears to lie in the far lower incidence of abortions performed for psychiatric reasons among poor and non-white women. In an era when non-psychiatric medical reasons for abortions have steadily decreased (Guttmacher, "The Shrinking Non-Psychiatric Indications for Therapeutic Abortion" in Rosen (ed.), Therapeutic Abortion 12 (1954)), a steadily increasing number of abortions have been performed for psychiatric reasons. Poor and non-white women have not been the recipients of this treatment, however, to the same extent as their white and wealthier sisters. As Hall wrote in 1965, the discrepancy documented above

> . . . may be attributed to the higher incidence of abortions for psychiatric indications among private patients. Whereas at Sloane Hospital [for Women, in New York City] one therapeutic abortion was performed for psychiatric reasons per 1,149 deliveries on the ward service, the comparable ratio for the private service was one per 104. . . . It would appear therefore that private patients with unwanted pregnancies are more often referred for primary psychiatric evaluation is more easily obtained for private patients. Hall, "Therapeutic Abortion, Sterilization and Contraception," 91 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 518 519, 522 (1965).

Dr. Hall's survey of 65 major hospitals confirms the same wide discrepancy in granting psychiatrically-related abortions. (Hall, op. cit. at 518.)

Why has this phenomenon occurred? Perhaps because

> . . . by the very nature of things, ward patients are less likely to have the necessary consultations requested, including the psychiatric, and to have the necessary recommendations made and accepted by a hospital board, than are their well-to-do sisters. Ethical and conscientious physicians decry this fact, but nevertheless find it impossible to controvert. . . . Rosen, "A Case Study in Social Hypocrisy," in Rosen (ed.), Abortion in America 299, 306-07 (1967).

B. As a Result of the Disproportionate Unavailability of Hospital Abortions to Them, the Poor and the Non-White Resort to Unsafe Criminal Abortions Which Lead to High Mortality and Morbidity Rates.

While socioeconomic conditions never per se legally warrant therapeutic abortion, socioeconomic status nevertheless frequently determines whether or not an abortion will be performed, and if performed, whether that self-same abortion will be therapeutic or criminal. Rosen, "Psychiatric Implications of Abortion: A Case Study in Social Hyprocrisy," 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 435, 450 (1965).

Criminal abortion has been described as the greatest single cause of maternal mortality in the United States; it is one of the greatest cause fo disease, infection, and resulting sterilization as well. See Leavy & Kummer, "Criminal Abortion: Human Hardship and Unyielding Laws", 35 So. Cal. L. Rev. 123 (1962); see also People v. Belous, supra at 965-66. The poor and the non-white suffer disproportionately from the "back-alley" abortionists, whose services they seek out in lieu of the medically safe hospital abortions generally denied them.

California, the only state known to officially compile such figures, notes that approximately 7 percent of that state's non-white female population subjected themselves to criminal abortion in 1968, as opposed to only 1½ percent of the state's white female population. (California Dept. of Public Health, Third Annual Report on the Implementation of the California Therapeutic Abortion Act, Tab. 4 (1970).)

The often tragic results of these abortions are also documented. In their New York study, Drs. Gold, et al. op. cit. at 970-71, noted that the ratio of criminal abortion deaths per 1,000 live births was 4.0 for white women and 16.2 for non-whites. Likewise, Dr. Hall's 1960-62 study led him to conclude that approximately half of the puerperal deaths among New York's Negroes were due to criminal abortions as opposed to only a quarter of the puerperal deaths among white women. Hall, op. cit., 57 Am. J. Pub. Health at 1934.

C. Where Abortion Restrictions Have Been Eliminated, the Poor and the Non-White in Fact Receive Abortion Services in a Non-Discriminatory Manner.

In sharp contrast to the above data has been the experience in New York State since July 1, 1970, when categorical restrictions on abortion were eliminated. See N.Y. Pen. Law §125.05 (McKinney Supp. 1970). On April 5, 1971, New York City health officials reported that the city's public hospitals, which restricted abortions to city residents, were performing an average of 511 a week, and that the "vast majority" of those women would be unable to afford abortions in private hospitals. N.Y. Times, April 6, 1971, at 25.

A later report, issued on June 29, 1971, was even more revealing:

> In the first six months, non-whites and Puerto Ricans, who had little access to legal abortions prior to the law, received half the abortions done on women in [New York City]. In the first nine months, 31% of the city's abortions done on state residents were reimbursable under Medicaid. American Medical News, July 12, 1971, at 9.

It is clear from this evidence that where the law has eliminated restrictions on the obtaining of abortions, the poor and non-white women who were previously unable to exercise the financial and other kinds of leverage required to have a "therapeutic" abortion, are able to obtain medically safe abortions on an equal basis with all other women, and they do obtain them to at least the same extent as their more privileged sisters. One result has been a drop in the maternal mortality rate: New York City hospitals now report treating far fewer victims of "botched" illegal abortions than they did in years past. "The maternal mortality rate—to which criminal abortions have always contributed a major portion—is now at a record low of 2.3 per each 10,000 live births, compared with 5.2 . . . at this time last year." Id.

D. The Impact of the Restrictive Abortion Law Effectively Denies Equal Protection to the Poor and Non-White.

It has been amply demonstrated above that poor and non-white women are not treated equally with other women in obtaining lawful abortions. However neutral its facial appearance, and however unexceptionable its underlying intent, the practical effect of a statute in denying equal treatment to classes of persons, such as the poor or the non-white, must be measured by the Court.

> Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet, if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the constitution. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 373-74.

The standard articulated in Yick Wo has been consistently applied by this Court. Moreover, it has been applied to statutes which have a natural discriminatory effect, whether or not there is evidence of any "evil" public administration.

Where the class affected is the poor, see Griffin v. Illinois, [351 U.S. 12 (state's provision of criminal appeal, but not of free transcript held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor defendants); Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, 383 U.S. 663 (state's exaction of a poll tax from all voters held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor voters); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (state's refusal to make welfare payments to residents of less than one year held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor recent residents and to the foreign poor who wish to travel to the state); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (state's provision of criminal appeal, but where appellate court decides in advance of hearing whether appointment of counsel for indigent would be "helpful", held to be an effective denial of equal protection to poor defendants). See also Williams v. Oklahoma City, 395 U.S. 458; Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367; Long v. District Court of Iowa, 385 U.S. 192; Rinaldi v. Yaeger, 384 U.S. 305; Hobson v. Hansen, 269 F. Supp. 401 (D.D.C. 1967), aff'd sub nom. Smuck v. Hobson, 408 F. 2d 175 (D.C. Cir. 1969).

Where the class affected is non-white, see Gomillion v. Lightfeet, 364 U.S. 339 (state's drawing of voting district lines which effectively excluded Negroes from a city district held to be an effective denial of equal protection to Negroes); Patton v. Mississippi, 332 U.S. 463, and Smith v. Texas, 311 U.S. 128 (state's facially neutral system of jury selection was administered to largely exclude Negroes held to be an effective denial of equal protection to Negroes).

The impact of the cases cited immediately above is that, while the state may not be bound to confer the benefit at issue (here, the categorical exception and "preserving life" to its basic anti-abortion statute), if it chooses to do so it is obliged not to effectively preclude enjoyment of the benefit to classes like the poor and non-white. Thus, in Griffin v. Illinois, supra, the state was not obliged by due process to provide appeals from criminal convictions, but since it has chosen to do so, it could not provide them in a manner that effectively denied poor persons access to the appeal process.

> The effect of the [Griffin] decision is to require Illinois to take account of economic inequities not of its own creation. Note, "Developments in the Law—Equal Protection," supra, 82 Harv. L. Rev. at 1178.

If the State of Texas had chosen not to regulate the medical practice of abortion, the prevailing standards of medical practice in the United States today would sanction its performance without categorical restrictions. See AMA, Policy Regarding Abortion (Resolution of AMA House of Delegates, June 25, 1970) discussed in "AMA Eases Abortion Rules," N.Y. Times, June 26, 1970, at 1; American College of Obstetrics & Gynecology, Policy on Abortion, discussed in Medical Tribune, Oct. 12, 1970, at 1. It is true that the poor and non-white would still be limited by obtaining treatment by the natural factors of inability to pay, not having a family physician, and the limited number of free or subsidized-care facilities in their communities. Nevertheless, it is clear that the state's entry into the field has aggravated the natural limitations of the poor and the non-white by imposing artificial limitations which make it extremely difficult for the poor and non-white to receive the treatment. This results in an effective denial of equal protection to the poor and non-white, for which the state has demonstrated no compelling controversial interest.

In sanctioning the vastly disproportionate exclusion of the poor and non-white from abortion services, the state cannot assert that its purpose is to cut down the number of abortions. Where abortion is otherwise lawful, and the poor or non-white woman legally qualifies, the state has no interest in eliminating that which it does not prohibit. The impact on the poor and non-white cannot be justified in terms of state budget-saving, since restrictive abortion laws do not bear any rational relation to the allocation of state resource, and they are clearly not a mere economic regulation. See Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471. Even were budget-saving asserted, in that medical care for the poor and non-white is often subsidized by public funds (e.g., the Medicaid program, 42 U.S.C. 1396 et seq.), it cannot be accomplished by arbitrarily selecting classes to suffer the deprivation. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618.

III.

The Delegation of Authority to Physicians to Approve Abortions at Their Peril Results in Discrimination Against Poor and Non-White Women, Denying to Them the Equal Protection of the Laws.

The Georgia legislature has a protected class of women who may receive legal abortion: those whose lives would otherwise be lost. Tex. Pen. Code, Art. 1196.

The legislature has then given the authority to determine who falls into this class, and when a life is threatened, to physicians.

Abortion is otherwise criminal in Texas, punishable by a two to five year prison term. Tex. Pen. Code. art. 1191.

Abortions performed outside of the Texas abortion law or performed in error under the statute are criminal abortions. Physicians may clearly be prosecuted even though excepted under the statute, since a prosecutor and jury may not agree with the physician as to the "life-saving" necessity of the abortion. The burden of going forward with the evidence to prove non-necessity may be on the prosecution, but the decisions of physicians are not immune from prosecution. See U.S. v. Vuitch, ..... U.S. ....., 91 S. Ct. 1294, 1298; but cf. U.S. v. Vuitch, 91 S. Ct. 1294, 1311-12 (Stewart, J., dissenting in part).

The Texas legislature has assigned to these physicians the task of determining whether a woman falls into this "life-saving" category at their peril. A prosecutor may choose to disagree with the determination in favor of the woman, and a "second-guessing lay jury" may choose to convict. See U.S. v. Vuitch, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1312 (Stewart, J., dissenting in part).

It must be noted here that so long as this second-guessing of medical judgment is permitted, the mere existence of a moral temper adverse to abortion in the prosecutor's office or in the community may have a heavy influence on the making of that judgment. The majority in Vuitch suggest that this "danger exists in all criminal cases, not merely those involving abortions." U.S. v. Vuitch, supra, 91 S. Ct. at 1299, n. 7. This is not so. In virtually all criminal cases the factual issue for the jury to decide is whether or not the defendant committed the criminal act charged, the act and the crime being one and the same. In abortion cases, commission of the act of abortion by th physician, or its abetment by the committee, may be conceded. The criminality of the act under the statute is, in every case, a matter of qualitative judgment. This is not to say that voir dire of jurors and the watchfulness of judges does not blunt the danger (U.S. v. Vuitch, id.) but it does point up the danger to physicians in a hostile environment when it is not their commission or abetment of the act which may be criminal, but the quality of their expert judgment. This "danger" does not exist in all criminal cases. Mr. Justice Clark has added:

> . . . [D]octors face an uncertain fate when performing an abortion. This uncertainty will continue unless the legislatures or courts provide relief from liability. Clark, "Religion, Morality and Abortion: A Constitutional Appraisal", 2 Loy. U. (L.A.) L. Rev. 1, 7 (1969).

On the other hand, no prosecution or penalty exists for physicians who decide that the woman is not qualified for an abortion. In considering the slanted consequences of this kind of legislative delegation, the California Supreme Court, in that state's landmark abortion case, said:

> The inevitable effect of such delegation may be to deprive a woman of an abortion when under any definition [of the statutory categories] she would be entitled to such an operation, because the state, in delegating the power to decide when an abortion is necessary, has skewed the penalties in one direction: no criminal penalties are imposed where the doctor refuses to perform a necessary operation, even if the women should in fact die. . . . The pressures on a physician to decide not to perform an absolutely necessary abortion are . . . enormous . . . People v. Belous, supra at 973.

Amici do not suggest that every physician faced with the possibility of prosecution, and with having his own medical judgment subjected to lay public review, cannot nevertheless render a fair decision on the merits of an application for abortion. But the risk to be run that the average physician will not be able "to hold the balance nice, clear and true" is substantial, and its impact on Due Process plain. Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 532. This kind of risk of a skewed decision by a personally interested decision-maker has regularly been held to be an invalid delegation of authority. See In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133; Mayberry v. Pennsylvania, 400 U.S. 455; Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368; Tumey v. Ohio, supra.

Furthermore, the decision-making process under this delegation of authority has all the aspects of a star chamber proceeding. Time is obviously of the essence in considering an application for abortion, and there is no appeal from an abortion committee's decision. The decision is made in private, with no provision for personal appearance by the applicant. And in this situation, the question to be decided may be one of life or death, the most fundamental of all human rights.

Where a poor, non-white woman is in need of abortion, the delegation of this authority results in a denial of equal protection, because the poor woman is restricted by her economic circumstances to seeking abortion in a hospital willing or otherwise obliged to treat indigents. Nothing in the law or in common medical practice prevents the affluent woman from consulting with any physician and going to any hospital most likely to provide the desired treatment. The denial of abortion to a poor woman under these circumstances has the effect of a decision res judicata. The more affluent woman may shop among hospitals and doctors until she finds those who will favor her application, even if it has been rejected elsewhere.

The most disastrous result of the abortion committee system has been the economic and social > discrimination against one group—the ward patients. In large cities the poor . . . are virtually denied the same medical care as the privileged few. Lader, Abortion 29-30 (1966).

The abortion practices of hospitals treating the poor, as compared with the same practices respecting the affluent (Part II, supra), reflect the discriminatory result of this delegation of authority. Thus, in effect, a denial of equal protection results when a statute conferring a right to an abortion upon certain kinds of women operates to confer decision-making authority as to the affluent upon numerous abortion-providers, but in effect results in limiting decision-making authority as to the poor to one (or none) or a very few lawful abortion providers with substantial and compelling interests impairing thier ability to decide impartially whether a woman is entitled to an abortion.

IV.

The Texas Abortion Law, While Permitting Abortion to Save a Woman's Life, Irrationally Excludes From Its Protection Women Whose Health May Be Seriously Theatened, Who Bear a Deformed Fetus, Who Have Been Victims of Sexual Assault, Who Are Financially, Socially or Emotionally Incapable of Raising a Child and Whose Family Tranquillity and Security Would Be Seriously Disrupted by the Birth of Another Child, Exclusions Which Bear Most Heavily on the Poor and Non-White, and Which Do Not Serve Any Compelling or Reasonable State Interest, Denying to These Women the Equal Protection of the Law.

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires the states to "exercise their powers so as not to discriminate between their inhabitants except upon some reasonable differentiation fairly related to the object of regulations." Railway Express Agency v. New York, 336 U.S. 106, 112 (Jackson, J., concurring). The challenged statute operates to deny equal protection to women with compelling reasons for receiving therapeutic abortion, concurred in by their physicians, but whose physicians cannot advance as "medical advice" that the abortion is nesessary to "save" their lives. Tex. Pen. Code, art. 1196. Women so excluded are those who would suffer a serious impairment of physical or mental health from carrying a pregnancy to terms, those whose pregnancies are the result of rape or incest, those whose fetuses will, with high medical certainty, be born with gravely disabling physical or mental defects, and those who are financially unable or emotionally incapable of supporting a child, or of adding another child to a family whose limited resources are already strained by their devotion to raising children in being.

The equal protection infirmity of the Texas law does not arise from any blanket prohibition on abortion, which could be analyzed in strictly Due Process terms. It arises from the recognition by Texas of a class to be protected, for certain compelling reasons, and its refusal to extend that protection to other classes of women whose reasons may be equally compelling.

On its face, Tex. Pen. Code, art. 1196 recognizes "that the pregnant women's right to life takes precedence over any interest the state may have in the unborn." People v. Belous, supra, at 969. But, on its face, the state's definition of this right ("for the purpose of saving the mother's life") is itself irrational. Physicians are authorized to protect those in that class, at the risk of heavy penal sanctions for going beyond it, even though medically its definition makes no sense. Medical science is far from certain in any given case whether pregnancy will in fact lead to death, or whether it will merely impair health or have similar consequences, and this lay judgment of the Texas legislature has no basis in medical knowledge. The court below recognized this when it asked

> How likely must death be? Must death be certain if the abortion is not performed? Is it enough that the woman could not undergo birth without an ascertainably higher possiblity of death than would normally be the case? What if the woman threatened suicide if the abortion was not performed? How imminent must death be if the abortion is not performed? Is it sufficient if having the child will shorten the life of the woman by a number of years? These questions simply cannot be answered. 314 F. Supp. at 1223.

The classic study of the medical uncertainty of this statutory category may be found in Packer & Gampbell, "Therapeutic Abortion: A Problem of Law and Medicine," 11 Stan. L. Rev. 417 (1959), where eleven hypothetical abortion applications were presented to 29 California hospitals, then operating under a similarly worded "life-preserving" abortion law exception (Cal. Pen. Code 274-276 (West 1955), declared unconstitutional in People v. Belous supra). The responses of these hospitals as to whether or not they would perform abortions under the law in these hypothetical cases were astonishing in their variety and inconsistency. Amici here contend that for the legislature to single out a class of women for medical protection in terms that have no reasonably ascertainable medical meaning is to create an irrational classification ipse facto.

Furthermore, the fundamental interest involved in the case of each of the excluded classes of women is as deserving of constitutional protection as the "saving" (whatever it may mean) of the mother's life. Compelling a woman to give birth to a child which is the product of rape or incest, or which will be born deformed, or whose birth will damage the woman's own health or capacity to be a mother to the child or to her existing family, may be as unbearable to the woman as a vague threat to her life itself. That compulsion also puts her physician in the ethically questionable position of having to decide just how much injury he must allow her to bear, despite his obvious ability to prevent that injury, before he can confidently say to the prosecutor that he ultimately acted to save her life.

Certain assumptions must be made and constitutionally accepted to find that there is a basis of rationality to the exclusion of the above-mentioned classes of women from the statute's protection. One is that human-life begins with fertilization of egg by sperm. Another is that this "life" is equivalent to the life of the woman, and the life-saving exception to the abortion law is a rational balancing of interests by the state, analogous to the laws of self-defense.

It is remarkable that the existence of a one-day old fetus is to be equaled with the life of a grown woman. The woman is—beyond doubt—a human being, one upon whom other human beings (husband, children, etc.) depend in a variety of ways essential to the sanctity of the family, and whose impaired health may be critically disruptive to that family; or one who may not consented to sexual intercourse made felonious by the state, yet who is forced to bear the consequences of that same felonious act. This equivalency of interest between a microscopic embryo and the woman who bears it must be assumed in the Texas law, however, since that statute draws no lines, such as viability, as the time to invoke the state's protection. The reductio ad absurdum of constitutionally indulging such an equivalency of lives is demonstrated if one considers the case of the intrauterine device (IUD). This mechanical means of preventing pregnancy is gaining wide national acceptance as a safe and effective alternative to the oral contraceptive pills, which have been found to bear some serious risks (see, e.g., New Drug Regulation on Oral Contraceptives, 21 C.F.R. 130.45). Andres, "Intrauterine Contraceptive Devices," 40 Postgraduate Medicine 739, 742 (1966); Comm. on Human Reproduction, "Evaluation of Intrauterine Contraceptive Devices," 199 J.A.M.A. 647 (1967). Yet IUD's are not contraceptives, they are clearly abortificaients, whereby "the life of the fetus or embryo [is] destroyed in the woman's womb" (Tex. Pen. Code, art. 1191). IUD's act to inhibit the implantation and growth of the fertilized egg. Andres, op. cit., supra at 742. Thus in Texas and every state with a similar statute, the prescription and use of IUD's is as surely a criminal abortion as any other medical means to that end.

Amici have pointed out in Argument I, supra, that there is no support in the Constitution or common law for establishing the fetus as a human life or making that life equivalent, in terms of when the law protects, with its mother. Lacking a sound basis for giving the fetus full human status without any qualification as to its age in the womb, the exclusion of the aforesaid classes of women from access to medical treatment which they want and need, and which their physicians wish to render, is an arbitrary classification serving no compelling or reasonable state interest; access to that proper medical treatment would seem to be an interest as fundamental as any the Court has heretofore protected against arbitrary discrimination. See Argument I, supra; Shapiro v. Thompson, supra; Harper v. Virginia Bd. of Elections, supra; Griffin v. Illinois, supra.

Conclusion.

The equal protection infirmity of a statute whose burden is felt more acutely by the poor has been noted in Mr. Justice White's concurring opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra at 503:

> [T]he clear effect of these statutes as enforced is to deny disadvantaged citizens of Connecticut, those without either adequate knowledge or resources to obtain private counseling, access to medical assistance and up-to-date information in respect to proper methods of birth control. . . . In my view, a statute with these effects bears a substantial burden of justification when attacked under the Fourteenth Amendment. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535; Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232; McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 192.

Because the Texas abortion law has the clear effect of denying disadvantaged citizens access to safe hospital abortions, without any justification, it violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNECOLOGISTS, THE AMERICAN PSYCHIATRIC ASSOCIATION, THE AMERICAN MEDICAL WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION, THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MEDICINE, AND A GROUP OF 178 PHYSICIANS AS AMICI CURIAE

Interest of Amici Curiae

The individuals whose names are appended hereto as amici curiae are deans and vice presidents of medical schools, heads of departments of obstetrics, gynecology and pediatrics in medical schools, practicing physicians and surgeons who are specialists in those fields, and other physicians and psychiatrists having a particular interest in the subject matter of this brief. The organizations whose names are appended hereto are among the largest, oldest and most respected national organizations in the medical profession. These organizations are devoted to the promotion of the highest possible quality health care and it is toward that end that they join in this brief as amici. They include many leaders in the medical profession and renowned teachers in medical schools. As teachers, they are impelled to seek to protect the right of their students—the future generations of doctors—to give their patients the benefit of knowledge acquired in the medical schools. As practicing physicians, amici are bound by oath to give their patients the benefit of the best medical knowledge. These physicians are concerned that the Texas anti-abortion law prevents them from fulfilling their sworn duties and responsibilities in the highest traditions of their profession. They believe that the Texas anti-abortion statute is wrong in principle, fundamentally unsound in the light of present-day medical and surgical knowledge, and a serious obstacle to good medical practice. Amici believe that the restrictions imposed by the Texas statute on the performance of medically indicated therapeutic abortions interfere with the physician-patient relationship and with the ability of physicians to practice medicine in accordance with the highest professional standards. Amici are also concerned with the burden the law places on physicians to interpret, at their peril, a statute whose meaning and scope are not clear. Accordingly, amici deem it appropriate to offer arguments with respect to this area of law which is of vital concern to them.

The American Psychiatric Association is a non-profit, tax exempt, scientific and educational medical organization, comprised of those 18,783 qualified Doctors of Medicine who specialize as psychiatrists in the diagnosis, care and treatment of mental diseases and defects of the mind. Abortions are of prime interest to psychiatrists because pregnancy, child bearing, birth and abortions can have material effects upon the mental processes of patients requiring psychiatric diagnosis, evaluation and care.

The Board of Trustees of the APA on December 12-13, 1969, upon recommendation of the Committee on Psychiatry and Law, approved the following:

"Position Statement on Abortion

A decision to perform an abortion should be regarded as strictly a medical decision and a medical responsibility. It should be removed entirely from the jurisdiction of criminal law. Criminal penalties should be reserved for persons who perform abortions without medical license or qualification to do so. A medical decision to perform an abortion is based on the careful and informed judgments of the physician and the patient. Among other factors to be considered in arriving at the decision is the motivation of the patient. Often psychiatric consultation can help clarify motivational problems and thereby contribute to the patient's welfare."

I.

The Statute* Is Unconstitutionally Vague.

A. The Statutory "Saving Life" Test Is Void For Vagueness.

Under Texas law, abortion is permitted only "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." If, following the performance of an abortion, under this law, a physician is brought to trial and the jury disagrees with the physician's interpretation of the meaning of these quoted words, the physician is liable to imprisonment for from two to five years in the penitentiary.

This Court has declared that "a statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application, violates the first essential of due process of law." Connally v. General Construction Co., 269 U.S. 385, 391 (1926). "No one may be required at peril of life, liberty, or property to speculate as to the meaning of penal statutes. All are entitled to be informed as to what the State commands or forbids." Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451, 453 (1939). See also Giaccio v. Pennsylvania, 382 U.S. 399, 402-403 (1966). Under this standard the statute must fall, because amici respectfully submit that neither they, nor Dr. Hallford nor any other similarly situated physician receive proper notice from the statute of what acts and consultations in their daily practice of medicine will subject them to criminal liability. This Court's rejection of the vagueness argument in United States v. Vuitch, 91 Sup. Ct. 1294 (1971) does not vitiate the point in the instant case. In Vuitch the District Court rested its finding that the District of Columbia statute prohibiting abortions was vague on two grounds: first, that the burden of establishing that the decision to abort was within the statutory exception fell upon the accused physician in violation of the Fifth Amendment; and, second, that the statute prohibiting abortions except "as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health. . . ." * was vague for failing to make clear, inter alia, whether mental health as well as physical health was included. This Court held that the burden of pleading and proving that an abortion was not within the statutory exception fell not upon the defendant-physician, but upon the prosecutor, and that the term "health" included mental as well as physical well-being.

* The criminal laws relating to abortion, i.e., 2A Texas Penal Code, arts. 1191-94, 1196 at 429-35, 436 (1961) are collectively referred to as "the statute."

 2A Texas Penal Code, arts. 1191-94, 1196, at 429-35, 436 (1961).

Amici rest their vagueness argument upon different grounds. Amici contend that the phrase "for the purpose of saving the life" is so indefinite and vague that physicians must guess at its meaning and do in fact differ as to the meaning of the phrase. The word "save" has a broad range of possible meanings. The Random House Dictionary lists, inter alia, "to rescue from danger or possible harm, . . . to avoid . . . the waste of, . . . to treat carefully in order to reduce wear, fatigue, etc. . . ."

* 22 D. C. Code 201.

 Calderone, Abortion in the United States, 34, 35, 52, 167 (1958).

The term "life" has been defined as:

> 1. "That state of animals and plants or of an organized being, in which its natural functions and motions are performed or in which its organs are capable of performing such function." Black, Law Dictionary (4th ed. 1951).

> 2. "The sum of forces by which death is resisted." Id.

Life may mean the vitality, the joy, the spirit of existence, as well as merely not dying. The possible interpretations of the statute range therefore from a test requiring imminence of death to one which would permit abortion if desirable to preserve an enjoyable life, i.e., a test under which the physician could consider the effect of pregnancy upon the quality of the patient's life and not merely upon the fact of life as not death. The statute forces the physician to decide at his peril whether a strict or liberal interpretation, or one in between, is the one intended by the statute. It forces him at his peril to make a decision which may be gainsaid by a jury of non-peer laymen whose guess will be as good as his as to the meaning of this statute. In sum the statute fails to provide the certainty required of penal laws.

B. The Statute Mandates The Use Of A Test Which Is Inconsistent With The Best Medical Practice And Sets No Standards For The Application Of Its Test.

Physicians have a professional obligation to preserve and advance the health of their patients. Assuming arguendo that the statute should be read as requiring a judgment by the physician that without an abortion the patient will die, the statute conflicts with the physician's obligation because it commands him to ignore all the health interests of his patient with respect to termination of pregnancy unless he can predict that she will die without an abortion. Moreover, the statute does not tell the doctor what factors he may properly consider in making this prediction; nor how certain his prediction must be before he may decide to terminate his patient's pregnancy; nor how soon she must die if she does not have an abortion.

The process of predicting whether a person will die is highly complex. One of the factors in making such a prediction is the treatment given the patient. Often, alternative treatments are available to the doctor, and which treatment he will use depends on many factors and assumptions about his patient. The statute does not give the doctor any guidance as to the factors and assumptions he may take into account in determining if he may use termination of pregnancy to save his patient's life.

From a purely physiological viewpoint, other treatments than abortion may be available to save the life of the patient. However, doctors commonly must take account of factors that are not purely physiological. The factors that must be taken into account include: (1) the relative physical risk of alternative treatment, (2) the ability of a patient to sustain a rigid course of treatment, (3) her willingness to complete other treatment, (4) whether she will have good medical facilities available to her, (5) the doctor's own ability to effectively prescribe and complete alternative treatments, (6) the availability of alternative treatment from scarce specialists, (7) whether her mode of life will allow alternative treatment (e.g., must she care for a family or work, rather than take an extended rest cure), and (8) what she can afford.

In deciding whether he may terminate a woman's pregnancy, the doctor must guess at which of these factors he may consider in predicting whether abortion is necessary to save life, and he must guess at the relative weight he may give to any factor.

After examining his patient and considering all the information available to him, the physician may arrive at a probability that the woman will die if she does not have an abortion. The statute does not tell the doctor how certain of her death he must be before he may terminate her pregnancy. The statute does not tell him that he may terminate pregnancy only if it is more likely than not that she will otherwise die, or only if there is an even chance she will die, or only if there is a "significant" or "substantial" chance that she will die.

If a doctor predicts that a woman may die without an abortion, he may also be able to predict when she will die. Death may be imminent, it may come before delivery, it may come at or soon after delivery, or it may come some time after delivery. The only definite statutory requirements for an abortion appear to be that death be caused by continued pregnancy, and that death be sooner than if the woman did not complete her pregnancy. But almost any impairment of health will shorten life; continued pregnancy may impair a woman's health and shorten her life by some period of time. Her doctor then must guess at what life shortening must occur before he may terminate her pregnancy. He must guess whether the statute allows abortion only if his patient would otherwise die before delivery or if it is sufficient that her life would be significantly shortened thereafter.

If a patient threatens suicide, physicians do not know if they may rely upon the threat as a basis for abortion to save life. Psychiatric consultation may not be available because the woman may refuse such treatment. The non-psychiatrist may then be forced to evaluate the probability of suicide. The physician does not know how he may determine safely whether the patient is sincere in her threat. Furthermore, a woman who does not overtly threaten may be as inclined toward suicide as one who makes clear her threat. The non-psychiatrist doctor is not told whether he may consider suicidal tendencies whether they are stated by his patient, or not.

If a doctor may properly consider the fact that his patient may take her own life unless she receives an abortion, the question is opened whether he may consider the fact that she may seriously imperil her life by obtaining an illegal abortion. See WILLIAMS, THE SANCTITY OF LIFE AND THE CRIMINAL LAW 171 (1957). For a doctor to consider his patient's threat to obtain an illegal abortion by an unlicensed person is a logical step from his considering her threat of suicide, because such illegal abortions are extremely hazardous and are in fact a common cause of maternal deaths.

Physicians are unable to agree on the meaning of the statute because its words have no medical meaning. Medical standards have been established for treating patients and for terminating pregnancy as part of that treatment. The statute cuts across those standards and requires physicians to apply an unclear legal test which supersedes and may negate their medical judgment.

II.

The Texas Anti-Abortion Statute Infringes Upon Constitutionally Protected Fundamental Rights of Physicians and of Patients.

A. The Statute Unconstitutionally Interferes With The Physician's Right To Practice Medicine.

Unquestionably there is a constitutionally protected right to practice one's chosen profession.

> "A State cannot exclude a person from the practice of law or from any other occupation in a manner or for reasons that contravene the Due Process or Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U.S. 232, 238-9 (1957). See also Willner v. Committee on Character and Fitness, 373 U.S. 96 (1963).

The practice of medicine clearly includes the treatment of pregnancy and its attendant conditions. The statute interferes with a physician's practice of medicine by substituting the mandate of a vague legalism for the doctor's best professional judgment as to the medically indicated treatment for his pregnant patients.

Physicians and surgeons in many special branches of medicine routinely make extremely serious decisions regarding their patients' best medical welfare, often with life or death in the balance. But those physicians treating pregnant women run the risk of criminal charges as the result of their professional decisions.

The statute unfairly discriminates against those physicians treating pregnant women and thus denies these physicians equal protection of the laws.

A criminal lawyer must often make weighty decisions on behalf of his client and sometimes the client's very life hangs in the balance. But no lawyer runs the risk of criminal prosecution and of being judged on his professional decisions by a jury of non-peer laymen.

The statute also burdens the physician-patient relationship in this situation with conflicting objectives, rendering candor and confidence impossible to achieve. Normally physician and patient share the same goal and work together in an atmosphere of mutuality and privacy toward that goal. In the situation of a pregnant woman seeking an abortion the physician-patient relationship deteriorates into an adversary proceeding with the patient trying to persuade and the physician trying to judge correctly to protect himself. Aarons, Therapeutic Abortion and The Psychiatrist, 124 Am. J. Psychiatry, 745 (1967).

B. *The Statute Deprives Patients Of Their Constitutionally Protected Right To Medical Treatment.

The statute forbids all abortions except those necessary to save the life of the mother. Construing the statute to intend its narrowest possible meaning, i.e., that abortions are lawful only when they will prevent certain and imminent death, it is clear that the operation of the statute may deny women abortions when the abortion would prevent injury or safeguard or preserve the patient's mental or physical health. Thus a woman suffering from heart disease, diabetes or cancer whose pregnancy worsens the underlying pathology may be denied a medically indicated therapeutic abortion under the statute because death is not certain. Such a patient is effectively denied a fundamental constitutional right reserved to her under the Ninth Amendment—the right to medical treatment.

In Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11 (1905) this Court upheld a compulsory vaccination law, on the ground that the State could validly require vaccinations under its police power to protect the public health from contagious disease. Anyone for whom the vaccination would pose a serious impairment of health would, however, be excepted from the statute's application. This Court held:

> "It is easy, for instance, to suppose the case of an adult who is embraced by the mere words of the act, but yet to subject whom to vaccination in a particular condition of his health or body, would be cruel and inhuman in the last degree. We are not to be understood as holding that . . . the judiciary would not be competent to interfere and protect the health and life of the individual concerned." Id. at 38-39.

A state may not require that a citizen impair his or her health, even if the individual's right to good health and medical care infringes upon some legitimate state interest. The State of Texas may not in pursuit of its policy infringe upon the constitutionally protected right of its pregnant citizens to the medical treatment they require to maintain their good health.

The anti-abortion statute denies women their right to secure the best medical treatment available and, further, positively and seriously impairs their health by forcing them to turn to illegal abortionists, most of whom are not licensed physicians and do not have the most advanced and safest medical techniques available for their use. Statistics are necessarily uncertain, but a frequent estimate is that over one million criminal abortions occur in the United States each year, resulting in an estimated 5,000 maternal deaths annually. Moritz & Thompson, Septic Abortion, 95 Am. J. Obst. & Gynec. 46 (1966); Bates & Zawadzki, Criminal Abortion 3 (1964).

That 5,000 American women a year should be denied medically safe procedures and thus be driven to their untimely deaths to avoid bearing unwanted children is unconscionable.

Death due to complications following illegal abortion procedures are only part of the problem. Many thousands of other women needlessly suffer serious infections following these procedures in addition to pain, suffering and emotional trauma.

C. The State, Through The Physician, Denies Patients Due Process Because The Physician Making The Decision Has A Direct Personal Interest In Deciding Against Abortion.

The State of Texas is ultimately responsible for the decisions not to terminate pregnancies made by physicians in the course of their private medical practices. The State is imposing its will upon the behavior of private parties and cannot claim these decisions are private ones. See Lombard v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 267 (1963); Peterson v. City of Greenville, 373 U.S. 244 (1963); Burton v. Wilmington Parking Authority, 365 U.S. 715 (1961).

The physician is not disinterested in the decision he renders; he cannot make an impartial decision. The State declares that if he wrongly decides that an abortion is necessary to save life, he will be subject to criminal penalties. It shocks one's sense of justice when the person who administers the law stands to gain or lose personally by a decision he makes. If that person has a direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in the decision it violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, 523 (1927). A doctor has a direct, personal, substantial interest for his decision may send him to jail.

Not only does the State prevent the physician from making an impartial decision about terminating his patient's pregnancy, it unfairly influences this decision in a shocking way. The State says that only if the physician wrongly decides that the operation is needed to preserve her life is he criminally liable. If he wrongly decides the operation is not needed to preserve her life, he is subject to no criminal penalties. The State of Texas thus requires that all errors in a doctor's evaluation of his patient's need for termination of pregnancy be on the side of her death.*

One of the oldest and most famous cases stating that an impartial decision is required by the basic precepts of law involved medical doctors. Bonham's Case, 8 Coke 113b, 77 Eng. Reprint 646 (1610); see also Annotation, Judge, Interest in Fine or Penalty, 50 ALR 1256 (1927). In Bonham's Case, Lord Coke held that a panel of doctors could not decide a case, as required by Parliament, in which they had a personal, pecuniary interest. Moreover, the necessity of an impartial decision has been confirmed by a New York Court reviewing the decision of a panel of doctors to perform an abortion. McCandless v. State, 166 N.Y.S. 2d 272 (Ct. Cl. 1956), rev'd on other grounds and modified, 3 A.D. 2d 600 (3d Dept. 1957), aff'd 4 N.Y.2d 797 (1958). In McCandless, the court stated that the decision to perform an abortion "should have been carried on by physicians and/or psychiatrists whose only concern was the life of the patient." 166 N.Y.S. 2d at 276 (emphasis added).

* That this is not merely suppositious is evident from the comments of doctors who have examined therapeutic abortion practices. See Rosen, Psychiatric Implications of Abortion: A Case Study in Social Hypocrisy, 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 435, 443-444 (1965). See also Niswander, Medical Abortion Practices in the United States, 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 403, 418-419 (1965).

A physician practising medicine under the Texas statute cannot keep as his sole concern his patient's life. A doctor would have to be superhuman if he were able to ignore the fact that his decision can be second-guessed by a jury which may totally disregard medical evidence. Therefore, his patient cannot receive the impartial decision required by due process of law.*

D. The Statute Interferes With The Constitutionally Protected Right Of Patients To Privacy.

The opinion of Mr. Justice Goldberg in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 494 (1965) refers to the following statement of Mr. Justice Brandeis in his dissent in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928) as "comprehensively summariz[ing] the principles underlying the Constitution's guarantees of privacy":

> "the makers of our Constitution . . . conferred, as against the Government, the right to be let alone—the

* Amici do not contend that a formal adversary hearing is required to meet the standards of due process. Within the legal bounds which might be established, amici believe that the decision is a medical one, requiring a technical, medical judgment. For this reason, an adversary hearing is not required by due process standards. See 1 DAVIS, ADMINISTRATIVE LAW TREATISE, 445-448 (1958). Due process however, does require an unbiased medical decision, where that decision determines whether a woman may live or die.

> most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the Government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the Fourth Amendment." 277 U.S. at 478.

The right to "personal security" and "privacy" against unreasonable governmental intrusion has been consistently protected as a basic right. See, e.g., Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961).

> "[F]undamental is the right to be free, except in very limited circumstances, from unwanted governmental intrusions into one's privacy." Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 564 (1969).

The freedom to be the master of her own body, and thus of her own fate, is as fundamental a right as a woman can possess.

The Texas statute, by forcing a woman to carry to full term an embryo—regardless of her wishes, her health, her circumstances, her finances, her family or her future—is the most severe and extreme invasion of her right to privacy.

She is forced to function as a baby factory for an unwanted child. In addition to the gross invasion by the state into a pregnant woman's physical autonomy, the law imposes enormous additional obligations on this woman toward her child once it is born. Furthermore, these obligations, involuntarily assumed, continue for many years throughout the child's minority.

This Court has repeatedly recognized the right to privacy in matters involving the family. Thus, matters involving child rearing (Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Meyer v. State of Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)), marriage (Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)) and child bearing (Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)) have been held by this Court to involve fundamental rights not subject to abridgement by the state. The statute clearly has its major impact on intimate intra-family relations—compelling reproduction which is not wanted. Most abortions are obtained by married mothers. Rosen, Psychiatric Implications of Abortion: A Study In Social Hypocrisy, 17 W. Res. L. Rev. 435, 436 (1965).

Both the Skinner and Griswold cases dealt with the issue of the constitutionality of state regulation of the right to reproduce and on both occasions this Court acted to protect those rights from state interference.

It is unthinkable for a state to compel reproduction against a woman's wishes. The right of a woman to avoid pregnancy following conception has been recently recognized in State and Federal Courts.

People v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 996 (1969); People v. Barksdale, —— Cal. App. 3d ——, —— Cal. Rptr. ——, 1 Crim. 9526 (Calif. Dist. Ct. App. July 22, 1971); Rogers v. Danforth, No. 315512 (Mo. Supp. 1048 (N.D. Ga. 1970) supplemental opinion Oct. 14, 1970 per curiam, juris. postponed, 402 U.S. —— (No. 971, 1970 Term; renumbered

This Court should not fail to protect the fundamental constitutional right of women to decide whether they want to have children.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons hereinabove stated, it is respectfully requested that the relief sought by appellants and the appellant-intervenor be granted.

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

BRIEF OF AMERICANS UNITED FOR LIFE, AMICUS CURIAE, IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEE.

INTEREST OF THE AMICUS CURIAE.

Americans United for Life is a national, non-sectarian, educational organization of citizens who affirm the sacredness of all human life from conception to natural death. Its principal offices are at 422 Washington Building, Washington, D. C. 20005. It is a particular purpose of Americans United for Life to promote a wider application of constitutional rights to children in the womb. It is this purpose which gives Americans United for Life an interest in this appeal. For this appeal involves the issue of whether the child in the womb is entitled to the protection of constitutional rights in the specific situation where his abortion is sought where it is not necessary to save the life of the mother.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED.

The aspect of this case argued in this brief involves the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code. The specific portion of the Fourteenth Amendment involved reads as follows: "No state shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." The pertinent provisions of the Texas Penal Code forbid abortion where it is not necessary to save the life of the mother; they are set forth verbatim in the briefs of appellant and appellee.

QUESTION PRESENTED.

Whether an injunction should issue to bar enforcement of the Texas statutes that forbid abortion where it is not necessary to save the life of the mother.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

The child in the womb is a person within the meaning of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The equal protection clause forbids classifications by law that are arbitrary, capricious or unreasonable. To allow the child in the womb to be killed by abortion, where it is not necessary to save the life of his mother, would be to subject him to an arbitrary, capricious and unreasonable classification. This is so because he is in fact a living human being and his young age and his situation do not provide a sufficient basis for a legal determination that he is subject to death where older human beings are not so subject. Enforcement of the statute in question should not be enjoined since such an injunction would allow the child in the womb to be killed by abortion where it is not necessary to save the life of his mother. It would therefore deprive him of the equal protection of the laws.

ARGUMENT.

I.

THE CHILD IN THE WOMB IS A PERSON WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U. S. 68, 70, 20 L. Ed. 2d 436, 439, 88 S. Ct. 1509 (1968), the Court said:

> We start from the premise that illegitimate children are not "nonpersons." They are humans, live, and have their being. They are clearly "persons" within the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The child in the womb meets these criteria of personhood under the Equal Protection Clause. He is human, he lives and he has his being. That is, he is a living human being. As the highest court of New Jersey summarized the state of scientific knowledge, "Medical authorities have long recognized that a child is in existence from the moment of conception." (Smith v. Brennan, 31 N. J. 353, 362, 157 A 2d 497, 502 (1960))

The character of the child in the womb as a person is clearly recognized in the law of torts. The attitude of the law of torts toward the child in the womb was summarized by Dean William L. Prosser:

> So far as duty is concerned, if existence at the time is necessary, medical authority has recognized long since that the child is in existence from the moment of conception, and for many purposes its existence is recognized by the law. The criminal law regards it as a separate entity, and the law of property considers it in being for all purposes which are to its benefit, such as taking by will or descent. After its birth, it > has been held that it may maintain a statutory action for the wrongful death of the parent. So far as causation is concerned, there will certainly be cases in which there are difficulties of proof, but they are no more frequent, and the difficulties, are no greater, than as to many other medical problems. All writers who have discussed the problem have joined in condemning the old rule, in maintaining that the unborn child in the path of an automobile is as much a person in the street as the mother, and in urging that recovery should be allowed upon proper proof. [Prosser, Handbook of the Law of Torts (4th Ed., 1971), 336]

It is significant that a majority of courts, keeping pace with advancing scientific knowledge, now hold that even a stillborn child may maintain a wrongful death action where his death was caused by a prenatal injury. [Kwaterski v. State Farm Mut. Ins. Co., 34 Wis. 2d 14, 148 N. W. 2d 107 (1967); State to Use of Odham v. Sherman, 234 Md. 179, 198 A. 2d 71 (1964); see discussion in Prosser, Handbook of the Law of Torts (4th Ed., 1971)]

A similar trend can be seen in the law of property. As long ago as 1946, it was noted in Bonbrest v. Kotz, 65 F. Supp. 138, 140 (D. C., Dist. Col., 1946), that, "From the viewpoint of the civil law and the law of property, a child en ventre sa mere is not only regarded as a human being, but as such from the moment of conception—which it is in fact." The law of property has long recognized the rights of the child in the womb for purposes which affect the property rights of that child. In Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 227, 31 Eng. Rep. 117, 163 (1798), the court rejected the contention that a devise for the life of a child in the womb was void because such a child was a non-entity:

> Let us see, what this non-entity can do. He may be vouched in a recovery, though it is for the purpose of making him answer over in value. He may be an executor. He may take under the Statute of Distributions . . . He may take by devise. He may be entitled > under a charge for raising portions. He may have an injunction; and he may have a guardian.

When the property rules of the English common law were adopted by American courts the same approach was taken:

> It has been the uniform and unvarying decision of all common law courts in respect of estate matters for at least the past two hundred years that a child en ventre sa mere is "born" and "alive" for all purposes for his benefit. [In re Holthausen's Will, 175 Misc. 1022, 1024, 26 N. Y. S. 2d 140, 143 (Surr. Ct., 1941)]

Indeed, there is authority for the proposition that the child in the womb will be regarded as in existence even where it is against his interest to do so. [In re Sankey's Estate 199 Cal. 391, 249 Pac. 517 (1926)]

For purposes of equity, too, the law has recognized the existence of the child in the womb. An unborn child, for example, can compel his father to provide him support. [Kyne v. Kyne, 38 Cal. App. 2d 122, 100 P. 2d 806 (1940); Metzger v. People, 98 Colo. 133, 53 P. 2d 1189 (1936)] He can compel his mother to undergo a blood transfusion for his benefit, even where such transfusion is forbidden by the mother's religious beliefs. In Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Memorial Hospital v. Anderson, 42 N. J. 421, 423, 201 A. 2d 537, 538 (1964), cert. denied 377 U. S. 985, 12 L. Ed. 2d 1032, 84 S. Ct. 1894 (1964), the mother for religious reasons refused to have blood transfusions which were medically necessary to save the life of the child in her womb. The court held that the child's right to live outweighed even the mother's right to the free exercise of her religion. The court said:

> We are satisfied that the unborn child is entitled to the law's protection and that an appropriate order should be made to insure blood transfusions to the mother in the event that they are necessary in the opinion of the physician in charge at the time.

POOR COPY

It would be possible to multiply medical opinions [See, for example, Bradley M. Patten, M.D., Foundations of Embryology (1964), 35, 82] and reinforcing legal decisions in support of the proposition that the child in the womb should be recognized as a person within the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause. Suffice it to say that the child in the womb satisfies the three criteria for personhood—he is human, he lives and he has his being—enunciated in Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U. S. 68, 70, 20 L. Ed. 2d 436, 439, 88 S. Ct. 1509 (1968). He is clearly alive and in being. As the living offspring of human parents, he can be nothing else but human. As a living human being he is therefore a person within the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause.

Even if one somehow does not concede that the child in the womb is a living human being, one ought at least to give him the benefit of the doubt. Our law does not permit the execution, or imprisonment under sentence, of a criminal unless his guilt of the crime charged is proven beyond a reasonable doubt. The innocent child in the womb is entitled to have us resolve in his favor any doubts we may feel as to his living humanity and his personhood.

II.

IF THE LAW WERE TO ALLOW THE CHILD IN THE WOMB TO BE KILLED WHERE IT IS NOT NCESSARY TO SAVE THE LIFE OF HIS MOTHER, IT WOULD MAKE HIM THE VICTIM OF AN UNREASONABLE CLASSIFICATION AND AN INVIDIOUS DISCRIMINATION IN VIOLATION OF THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In Takahaski v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410, 420, 92 L. Ed. 1478, 1487, 63 S. Ct. 1138 (1948), the Court said, "The Fourteenth Amendment and the laws adopted under its authority thus embody a general policy that all persons lawfully in this country shall abide "in any state" on an equality of legal privileges with all citizens under non-discriminatory laws." It is true that the Equal Protection Clause does not forbid all classifications. "The prohibition of the Equal Protection Clause goes no further than the invidious discrimination." [Williamson v. Lee Optical of Oklahoma, 348 U. S. 483, 489, 99 L. Ed. 563, 573, 75 S. Ct. 461 (1955).]

In Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535, 541, 86 L. Ed. 1655, 1660, 62 S. Ct. 1110 (1942), the Court invalidated an Oklahoma compulsory sterilization statute on the ground that it denied equal protection of the laws because it arbitrarily determined who would be subject to sterilization. One comment by the Court in Skinner is particularly relevant in this abortion case because it emphasizes the special scrutiny that must be given to statutes that interfere with basic rights:

> We are dealing here with legislation which involves one of the basic civil rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race. The power to sterilize, if exercised, may have subtle, far-reaching and devastating effects. In evil or reckless hands it can cause races and types which are inimical to the dominant group to wither and disappear. There is no redemption for the individual whom the law touches. Any experiment which the State conducts is to his irreparable injury. He is forever deprived of a basic liberty. We mention these matters not to reexamine the scope of the police power of the States. We advert to them merely in emphasis of our view that strict scrutiny of the classification which a State makes in a sterilization law is essential, lest unwittingly or otherwise, invidious discriminations are made against groups or types of individuals in violation of the constitutional guaranty of just and equal laws.

The right to live is more basic even than the right to procreate. And there is "no redemption" for the aborted child in the womb. The abortion is to his "irreparable injury" and by it he "is forever deprived of a basic liberty." Any law which interferes with the right to live must therefore be carefully scrutinized. It is appropriate to apply here the principles which govern the application of the Equal Protection Clause to another basic right—the right to be free from racial discrimination. The Court declared in McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U. S. 184, 196, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222, 231, 85 S. Ct. 283 (1964), that a state law "which trenches upon the constitutionally protected freedom from invidious official discrimination based on race . . . even though enacted pursuant to a valid state interest, bears a heavy burden of justification, as we have said, and will be upheld only if it is necessary, and not merely rationally related to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy."

There is no sufficient necessity which justifies a law which permits the killing of the child in the womb where it is not necessary to save the life of his mother. We are not concerned in this appeal with the question of whether a state law can constitutionally allow abortion where it is necessary to save the life of the mother. Rather the issue is whether the constitution permits the child in the womb to be killed where it is not necessary to save the life of his mother. To permit the child in the womb to be killed in such a case improperly discriminates against him on account of his age and situation. For the law does not allow a born child or an adult to be killed at the discretion of another or in any other situation where his killing is not necessary to save the life of another. (See United States v. Holmes (E. D. Pa. 1842) 1 Wall Jr. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 15,383; Regina v. Dudley (1884) 15 Cox C. C. 624, 14 Q. B. D. 273)

Discrimination in employment on account of age is now forbidden by federal law which enunciates a strong public policy. [29 U. S. Code 622-23] And while age may be a reasonable criterion for determining the right to vote or to drive a car, it can hardly be contended that it is a reasonable basis for determining whether one has a right to continue living. The child in the womb should have the same right as his older brother or sister not to be killed where it is unnecessary to save the life of his mother. Nor should the fact that he temporarily reposes in his mother's womb rather than in an incubator or a crib operate to deprive the child of the right to continue living.

The child's right to continue living ought not to be considered inferior to any asserted right of the mother in this case, where her own life is not in danger. This includes the mother's right to privacy. In Wyman v. James, 400 U. S. 309, 318, 27 L. Ed. 2d 408, 414, 91 S. Ct. 381 (1971), the Court held that a home visit by a welfare caseworker was not an infringement on the right of privacy of the plaintiff, a mother who was a recipient of Aid to Families with Dependent Children. Significantly, the Court noted:

> The public's interest in this particular segment of the area of assistance to the unfortunate is protection and aid for the dependent child whose family requires such aid for that child. The focus is on the child and, further, it is on the child who is dependent. There is no more worthy object of the public's concern. The dependent child's needs are paramount, and only with hesitancy would we relegate those needs, in the scale of comparative values, to a position secondary to what the mother claims as her rights. (Emphasis in original)

The dependent child in the womb is entitled to similar protection when what is involved is his very right to continue living.

CONCLUSION.

For the reasons stated herein Americans United for Life respectfully submits that the judgment appealed from, denying an injunction against the enforcement of the Texas statutes forbidding abortion where it is not necessary to save the life of the mother, should be affirmed on the ground that those statutes are constitutional.

Women For The Unborn et al respectfully move for leave to file the accompanying brief in these cases as amici curiae.

INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE

The interest of the organizations and the persons listed below as amici curiae in this case arises from the fact that there are appearing before this Court amici curiae and other groups of women who are advancing the rights of women alone. We are stressing the rights of the unborn without overlooking the rights of the mothers. This brief will treat the psychological, medical and other factors involved as well as legal points. However, it will not duplicate material presented in other briefs.

BRIEF OF WOMEN FOR THE UNBORN ET AL AS AMICI CURIAE

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Women have traditionally been the guardians of life.

It is to plead on behalf of life that we have prepared this brief. As women and mothers, we ask the Justices of the Supreme Court to consider our views, which can be summed up in the following four statements:

(1) The unborn child is a distinct individual. Modern genetics has confirmed scientifically what women have long felt intuitively—the presence of another human life, a life to be reverenced and protected.

(2) Many women who seek abortions are acting from an overpowering but temporary fear. Most of these women really desire to have their baby, and they will later be glad that their effort to secure an abortion was unsuccessful. In order to react constructively to the stresses and tensions of pregnancy, women need the support of society—not the address of the nearest abortion clinic.

(3) While abortion is an easy solution for many social problems, it is not a true solution for any. Its availability may prevent more constructive solutions from emerging.

(4) The social consequences of unlimited abortion are as yet unknown. Furthermore, both the moral and the legal arguments for abortion-on-demand have attained popularity only within the last few years. Since the test of time has not been applied, should a final decision be made which would extend abortion-on-demand to the entire country?

ARGUMENT
I
The unborn child is a distinct individual.

In August 1963, in a pamphlet entitled "Plan Your Children For Health and Happiness," Planned Parenthood had this to say about abortion:

> "An abortion requires an operation. It kills the life of a baby after it has begun. It is dangerous to your life and health. It may make you sterile so that when you want a child you cannot have it. Birth control merely postpones the beginning of life." [1]

Aside from the medical factors, we ask the Court to note the clear statement—made in the manner of a truism—that the life involved is a "baby" and that what abortion does is to "kill the life of a baby after it has begun." The moral distinction between postponing life and taking human life after it has begun could not be put more succinctly.

We realize that the pro-abortionists are often acting out of mercy. They want to save the mother—and occasionally the child—from future suffering. But is that sufficient reason to kill?

The answer to that depends upon what we are killing. When a dog or a cat is suffering terribly, we kill it out of mercy. When a man or a woman is suffering terribly, we do not kill. Why? Not because we think less of a man than of a cat, but because we think more. We believe that the man has a certain infinite dignity we should respect.

1) Although Planned Parenthood in 1971 looks more favorably on abortion, we believe this 1963 quotation is important because of ad hominem arguments that are frequently made against people opposing abortion. "Abortion kills the life of a baby after it has begun." If this is only an unusual Roman Catholic religious belief, would it follow that in 1963 Planned Parenthood was dominated by the Catholic Church? Or would it follow that Planned Parenthood was ignorant of modern medicine? Is either hypothesis a plausible one? Like other important social questions, the abortion question must be settled on the evidence itself—not on speculation about the motives or religion of people on either side.

Dr. Mortimer J. Adler, a leading authority on the history of moral questions, wrote the following on February 22, 1970:

> "The classical debate over abortion always centered on its relation to homicide. . .As far back as ancient Greece, the prevailing opinion seems to have been that the destruction of a human life free of personal guilt was murder, and that the distinction between a human child within and a human child outside the womb did not affect this principle."[2]

According to Dr. Adler, the only unsolved question concerned the existence of human life in the very early stages of pregnancy.[3] Until modern times, no certain answer could be given to that question since the necessary biological information was not available. But, in Dr. Adler's words, "the advances in medical knowledge seems to have had only one relevant effect: everything we now know about the chemical structure of the genes and their relation to life seems to indicate that the embryo is a fully potential human being from

2) The February 22, 1970 quotations from Dr. Adler are taken from his column in the Long Island Press.

3) Now that modern science has thrown light on this question, it should be noted that advocates of abortion are increasingly abandoning any distinction between early and late pregnancy.

Consider, for example, the position taken by New Yorkers for Abortion Law Repeal (Box 240, Planetarium Station, New York City, New York). During the 1971 New York legislative session, this organization lobbied extensively for a removal of that part of the new abortion law restricting abortion-on-demand to the first 24 weeks. In their informational material, New Yorkers for Abortion Law Repeal raised the question, "Isn't there a possibility that after 24 weeks the fetus will survive?" and replied, "With recent developments in medical technology, it is rapidly becoming possible for a fetus to survive outside the uterus at ANY stage of development–but this is not adequate reason to forbid abortion." (The emphasis on the word "any" was made by the abortion organization itself.)

We request the Court to note the two statements: first, that viability is becoming possible at any stage of development; second, that it makes no difference whatever.

the moment of conception. It is not surprising, therefore, that the proponents of abortion in the contemporary controversy tend to disregard the question of the human status of the embryo."

In considering the constitutionality of laws restricting abortion, is not the human status of the unborn child a significant consideration?

II

The woman is acting from fear.

Would it not be best to leave the abortion decision to the woman herself? After all, should not every woman possess the right to control her own body?

While these questions are sincerely asked, we believe they overlook two important factors. The first we have already discussed. A woman should have the right to control her own body, but the unborn baby is not just a part of her body.

But there is also a second factor. Let us consider the pregnant woman herself.

A woman who is pregnant experiences periods of great stress. Like most people at moments of high tension, she is often tempted to do certain things which she would not contemplate for an instant under normal circumstances. The fear within her is so overpowering that all long-range considerations fade away.

We do not want to overstate our case. Rarely does the fear result in suicide or permanent psychological damage to the woman. (In fact, suicide in the pregnant woman is about 1/6th the rate seen in nonpregnant women of the same age.[4]) Nevertheless, the temporary fear is great enough to bring many of us to near-panic. On such occasions, we can actually do what we really do not want to do—unless there is someone who will both restrain us from taking "the easy way out" and help us to face our fear in a constructive way.

What we are describing is something very common, as is pointed out by Gardiner in Williams Obstetrics, 13th edition, 1966. Here is what he says:

> "It is not unusual (however) for women who will become good mothers, or those who have already demonstrated their excellent maternal qualities with their older children, to react initially to the diagnosis of pregnancy with resentment, frustration and depression, only to express strong, genuine, positive feelings of acceptance as the pregnancy advances and fetal movements appear."[5]

A Norwegian study by P. Kolstad[6] confirms Gardiner's statement. Kolstad reports on 113 women who were refused a legal abortion and who then carried the pregnancy to term. 84% were later glad that the pregnancy was not terminated, 9% were uncertain, and only 7% were discontented.

(Incidentally, this study, as well as a similar study by Hook[7] in Sweden, disputes the claim that a woman refused a legal abortion will simply go elsewhere. In the Swedish study, which involved 249 women refused a legal abortion, 86% did not go elsewhere and carried their pregnancy to term.)

If so many women seeking an abortion really want their children, why do they act in this way? Gardiner describes the emotional reactions of the women involved as "so real and life-threatening" that they "reject the existence of the pregnancy before they, themselves, are engulfed and destroyed." He refers to this phenomenon as a "spell" of "distorted thinking and reasoning."[8]

In other words, a pregnant woman often feels like a person with claustrophobia. The walls are closing in. There is an overpowering desire to escape. Just as a man with claustrophobia may try to leave a moving train, although he will later be glad that someone restrained him, so a woman may seek an abortion but afterwards rejoice that she has been allowed to give birth.

If all this is true, is it really merciful for our society to step aside?

On September 9, 1971, an article in the New York Times expressed concern about young girls arriving in New York for abortions.[9] According to the article, some taxicab drivers were taking advantage of them. Because of the strain the young girls were under as well as their relative inexperience, they could not protect themselves from the excessive prices charged by unscrupulous drivers.

Imagine! Because she is young, fearful, and alone, society is afraid to leave to the girl herself the decision about the proper taxicab to take from the airport. But society is now asked to let that same girl face alone[10] the most awesome decision of all—whether to take the life within her or give birth to her child.

As women,[11] we believe the state laws restricting abortions protect both thousands of unborn babies and thousands of mothers. Therefore, we respectfully ask the Justices of this Court not to strike them down.

10) It is sometimes said that the abortion decision would be left to the woman and her doctor.

While this might have some validity in cases of therapeutic abortion, does it apply to abortions performed for economic and social reasons—not for medical reasons? Since a medical judgment is not involved, the doctor's role in the decision for a socio-economic abortion is likely to be no greater than the bus driver's role in a woman's decision to take a bus trip to Chicago. While the driver is needed as an instrument, would one be justified in claiming that the decision for such a journey had been made by the woman and her bus driver?

Forgetting that medical factors are not involved, the argument is sometimes raised that the prohibition against socio-economic abortions interferes with a doctor's right to practice medicine as he judges best. In reality, socio-economic abortions have nothing to do with medicine—any more than piercing the ears or operating on the nose for reasons of facial beauty are connected with medicine. A socio-economic abortion does not improve the woman's health. Needless to say, it certainly does not improve the health of the child.

11) How representative of American women are the views we are expressing? According to a Harris Poll of June 1970, 55% of American women opposed abortion-on-demand, while only 37% favored it. Opposition to abortion crossed religious lines, as the following breakdown indicates:

Abortion-On-Demand	Approve	Disapprove	Not Sure
Total Population	40%	50%	10%
By Religion:
Protestant	39%	49%	12%
Catholic	30%	64%	6%
Jewish	71%	18%	11%

III

The easy solution of abortion discourages more constructive solutions.

Even if one overlooks the biological evidence concerning the unborn child, or the psychological testimony that most women seeking to take the life of their unborn baby, like most persons seeking to take their own life, desire to be stopped by someone, is abortion really a satisfactory solution to any social problem?

Will the availability of the easier abortion "solution" discourage our society from seeking deeper and more permanent solutions?

Such a fear appears to lie behind the opposition to abortion-on-demand within the black community. Despite assurances by abortion advocates, many members of the black community seem to suspect that numerous abortion clinics in ghetto areas could end up as the "white man's" solution to the problems of poverty and race.[12]

When the poor cry out for bread, what response will they receive? The more difficult response—an equitable distribution of society's resources? Or the easier response—a list of centers where abortions can be performed on those who would not seek them except for their desperate poverty? While these two responses are not mutually exclusive, to what extent will the availability of the second lessen society's incentive to seek the first?

Sponsors of non-abortional family planning have also expressed concern that reliance on abortion could lessen the effectiveness of their efforts.[13] Could abortion-on-demand adversely affect other programs which require a commitment of society's resources—e.g., programs to assist the unwed mother or efforts to provide easily accessible counseling services for all women who need such support in order to respond constructively to the anxieties they experience during pregnancy?

12) According to the 1970 Harris Poll, 57% of the black community opposed abortion-on-demand, 29% favored it, and 14% were uncertain.

Perhaps these fears about the adverse social effects of easy abortion will turn out to be unfounded. At the moment, however, that is far from certain. Until some kind of definite evidence is available concerning the social pattern that is emerging in those states which have removed all restrictions on abortion, should a final decision be made which would extend abortion-on-demand to the entire country? For if easy abortion does indeed produce such undesirable social effects, would this not be a ground in itself for state regulation of the practice?

If a verdict of unconstitutionality is reached concerning state laws which protect the unborn child and the mother herself from an immediate decision to terminate life, then the legislative discussion is over. If these laws are held to be constitutional, their wisdom will continue to be debated in our state and national legislatures.

If any doubt exists, would it not be better to allow the discussion to continue?

On behalf of the unborn child. . .the mother. . .and society itself. . .we ask the Court to preserve the right of the state to protect unborn human life.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated herein, Women For The Unborn et al respectfully submit that the statutes challenged herein should be sustained on the grounds that permissive abortion constitutes an infringement on the rights and interests of women as well as of unborn children.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE

PURPOSE OF THE MOTION

The opposing parties in No. 70-18 (the Texas case) have given their written consent for The National Right to Life Committee[1] to file an amicus curiae brief. The appellants in No. 70-40 (the Georgia case) have also given written consent to the filing of such a brief.[2] While declining to give written consent to the filing of an amicus curiae brief by

[1] Hereinafter usually referred to as "NRLC".

[2] These consents have been filed with the Clerk.

NRLC, the appellees in the Georgia case have stated in writing that they do not object to this motion.[3]

INTEREST OF THE AMICUS CURIAE

1. Identification of the Amicus. The National Right to Life Committee is a non-sectarian, interdisciplinary organization that is committed to informing and educating the general public on questions related to the sanctity of human life. Protecting the right to life of the unborn child is of central concern for NRLC. The Committee believes that proposals for total repeal or relaxation of present abortion laws represent a regressive approach to serious human problems. NRLC is in favor of a legal system that protects the life of the unborn child, while recognizing the dignity of the child's mother, the rights of its father, and the responsibility of society to provide support and assistance to both the mother and child.

NRLC opposes the repeal of existing laws preventing or restricting an abortion, whether this be achieved by legislation or through court order. It is for this reason that NRLC seeks the Court's permission to participate in these two cases. In both, the appellants raised in the lower court, and again attempt to argue in this Court, grave constitutional questions concerning the power of state legislatures to enact laws which restrict the taking of life through the destruction of a live fetus. Candidly, NRLC has reservations concerning the Georgia statute, which permits abortion in several situations beyond that when abortion is necessary to save the life of a mother. Nevertheless, NRLC believes that neither the Texas nor the Georgia statute should be held unconstitutional on any basis urged by the appellants in the two cases at bar.

2. The Legal Position of NRLC in These Cases. As indicated, if the question before this Court were the most desirable form of abortion legislation, only the Texas statute would come close to the ethical and political position of NRLC;[4] the Georgia statute would fall substantially short of that position.[5] In these cases, however, NRLC is not concerned with the most desirable legislative resolution of opposing concepts of public morality and welfare, but with fundamental issues of constitutional power and policy. Accordingly, while not endorsing either the Texas or especially the Georgia statute as the ideal abortion law, NRLC, if granted leave by the Court to submit this brief, will argue that neither statute should be declared unconstitutional on any grounds raised by the appellants in the courts below and reiterated by them in this Court. In view of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, there can be no doubt that protection of human life against destruction without due process of law is one of the most fundamental values in American constitutional policy. To the extent that Texas and Georgia have acted to protect the unborn child against arbitrary destruction by private individuals, including doctors and mothers, Texas and Georgia have acted well within their constitutional power.

3. Justification for Participation as Amicus Curiae. On the basis of the motions filed in response to the jurisdictional statements filed in these two cases, it appears that in neither do the appellees intend to address themselves to several of the important constitutional issues which appellants have sought to raise. These issues are of major concern to this amicus. If considered and decided by this Court, their resolution will have a national impact, affecting the laws of

[4]The Texas statute permits abortion only "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

[5]The Georgia statute permits abortion in a case where "(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or (2) The fetus would be very likely born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect; or (3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape."

many states and going far in determining what are to be acceptable public mores.

Under these circumstances NRLC believes that both the spirit and the text of Rule 42(3) sanction its appearance as amicus curiae in these two cases for the purpose of arguing, inter alia, that the two statutes challenged were within the constitutional competence of Texas and Georgia to enact, since those states have a compelling interest in protecting human life, in the form of a living fetus, from destruction by abortion.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated herein, and as more fully expanded in the accompanying brief, NRLC respectfully requests that the Court grant its motion and accept for filing the amicus curiae brief submitted herewith.

BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE OF THE NATIONAL RIGHT TO LIFE COMMITTEE

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

The interests and identification of the amicus curiae are stated in the motion which NRLC has filed. The facts of record, the pertinent provisions of the Texas and Georgia statutes, the provisions of the United States Constitution involved and the opinions of the courts below are found either in the printed appendices or in the briefs filed by the appellants and appellees. This amicus accepts them for purposes of its own brief.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

A. These cases raise issues both of jurisdiction and of constitutionality. The basic jurisdictional question appears to this amicus to be whether the two lower courts should have abstained from exercising jurisdiction and granting declaratory judgments.

B. Should the Court conclude that the courts below properly exercised jurisdiction and that jurisdiction on appeal also exists in this Court, then it would be confronted with the following substantive issues:

1. Did either the Texas or Georgia court abuse discretion in refusing to issue the injunction sought by the respective appellants?[1]

2. Do the Georgia and Texas abortion statutes invade any alleged constitutional right of privacy on the part of a woman to abort an unborn child?

3. Are the statutes unconstitutionally vague?

4. Do the statutes impair First Amendment or Due Process rights of doctors to practice their profession?

5. Do the statutes deny equal protection of the laws to poorer citizens?

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I.

A. The Texas three-judge federal court should have abstained from granting declaratory relief. At the time the suit was instituted, state court criminal proceedings were pending against the doctor-plaintiff charging him with violations of the Texas abortion statute. In such a case, as this Court recently ruled, "relief by way of declaratory judgment should have been denied without consideration of the merits." Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66, 73 (1971).

B. The Georgia case presents the fact situation to which this Court referred but left undecided in Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971); i.e., no criminal prosecution was "pending in state courts at the time the federal proceeding . . . [was] begun." 401 U.S., at 41. The principles laid down in the Mackell, Younger and related cases decided by the Court at the last Term should also apply in this case. The state statute has never been construed by the Georgia courts, and those courts are available to provide both declaratory and injunctive relief in an appropriate case. Therefore, traditional principles of equity, federalism, comity and sound judicial administration support the proposition that the Georgia three-judge federal court should have denied declaratory relief without reaching the merits of the constitutional issues raised by the appellants.

II.

A. Whatever the metaphysical view, the legal concepts as to the nature and rights of an unborn child have drastically changed, based on expanding medical knowledge over the last 2,500 years. As recently as 1921, a respected state court could maintain that the child in the womb is part of his mother. The findings of medical science have destroyed that myth. The leading doctors and scientists in the field now agree that life begins at conception. They further agree that a developing fetus is alive, not only in the sense that he is composed of living tissue, but also in the sense that he is a living, striving human being, from the very beginning. Very early in the pregnancy the fetus manifests a working heart and brain different from his mother. There is absolutely no question but that his existence as an individual begins no later than the stage at which the cells which make up the fetus separate from those cells which later become the placenta. Thus, the state's interest in the preservation of human life in the womb rests upon the undisputed medical evidence.

B. From Bracton's day abortion was regarded at common law as a serious evil or wrong which should be prevented in order to curtail or stop the unnecessary destruction of human life. For a brief period difficulties of proving that an abortion had in fact caused the termination of an "unquick" child prevented application of the serious sanctions of the criminal law to some cases. However, when medical science eliminated those difficulties of factual proof, there was no longer any question but that one of the prime purposes of the abortion statutes was to prevent the destruction of the unborn fetus at all stages of gestation. Therefore, the compelling interest which Texas and Georgia have in prohibiting and regulating unjustifiable abortions is not one newly discovered or advanced as an afterthought argument.

C. The law has recognized the rights of an unborn child in other important areas. For example, the property rights of an unborn child, at all stages of fetal development, were recognized by English law before the end of the eighteenth century. The same recognition was afforded the property rights of an unborn child by American courts. In property law there was no requirement that the fetus must be "quick," i.e., that his presence within her body be felt or recognized by the mother. The rules protecting property rights of an unborn child have been applied even where their application benefited some third party rather than the child, and even where the child himself suffered disadvantage because of such application. We believe it would be an ironic and inexplicable perversion of both human and constitutional values if it were to be the law that a state has an interest in protecting the property rights of an unborn child but has no compelling, constitutionally justifiable interest in regulating the circumstances and conditions under which he may be destroyed.

D. In the field of tort law there has been a dramatic development and complete change in the law in response to expanding scientific knowledge and medical facts that formerly were unavailable. Until well into the twentieth century most American decisions denied recovery in tort to the human offspring harmed in the womb, primarily on the ground that the defendant owed no duty to a person who was not in existence at the time of the tort. The premise here, of course, was the now repudiated notion that the unborn child was a part of his mother. Almost every jurisdiction which has considered the issue in the last 30 years has upheld the right of an infant to sue for injuries sustained prior to birth, including the right to sue under a wrongful death statute, whether or not the injury occurred at the time the unborn child was viable or not. If the state may protect the unborn child by a court action awarding damages for a tort, a fortiori it cannot be impotent to protect the same living being by criminal sanctions which prohibit his arbitrary destruction.

E. It is also now established that the law will recognize an unborn child's right to support by his parents. If a state has sufficient justification to require a father to support an unborn child which he may not want, can it be fairly maintained that the same state has no justifiable interest in protecting from destruction as a living being a child which his mother may not want? This Court has firmly settled that the free exercise of religion rights guaranteed by the First Amendment are susceptible of restriction only to prevent grave and immediate danger to interests which the state may lawfully protect. Nevertheless, the right of an unborn child to live has served to permit the state's abridgement of or interference with a mother's religious convictions when necessary to save the life of an unborn child. These are cases where the court has to override the religious convictions of a mother and order a blood transfusion in order to save an unborn child within the womb. Either expressly or impliedly such judicial results are based on the findings of modern medical science concerning the nature of the fetus and constitute recognition of the right of the child in the womb to the protection of the law.

F. The amicus believes that in any balancing of constitutional values or rights, life must be preserved over alleged privacy. Even if there is a certain right of privacy on the part of a woman arising from the marital relationship, with which the state cannot unjustifiably interfere, there is another right involved here, and the most fundamental of the personal liberties protected by the Due Process Clause, i.e., the unborn child's right not to "be deprived of life," in the very words of that constitutional provision. Thus, the Court is not confronted with a balancing between a right of personal liberty on the one hand and some lesser competing state interest on the other. The choice here is between a nebulous and undefined right of privacy on the part of a woman with respect to the use of her body and the personal right to life of an unborn child, with a concomitant right on the part of a state to prevent its unjustifiable destruction.

The state's interest in regulating abortion is not bottomed exclusively on its concern for the health of the mother. The state interest which justifies what the Congress had done rests on concern for the preservation of human life, even though that life be within the womb. There are no decisions of this Court which suggest the existence of an unrestricted right of bodily integrity on the part of a woman sufficient to permit her alone to decide, for whatever reason, whether to terminate a pregnancy. Nor does a married couple's right to plan a family and to space their offspring encompass the right to intentionally destroy an unborn, but living, fetus any more than it would justify infanticide. Moreover, to sustain the attack on the statute which the appellants make in urging that it offends against an alleged right of privacy would require this Court's unabashed return to the long-repudiated concept of substantive due process which plagued its decisions for several generations.

Public and medical opinion with respect to relaxation of the abortion laws is divided. However, the predilections of the populace, much less the individual preferences of judges, cannot serve as a basis to strike down legislation within the competence of a state to enact, especially when such legislation is aimed at protecting the most fundamental of the personal liberties protected by the Due Process Clause, that is, the right not to "be deprived of life."

G. All the cases cited by the appellants in support of the claim that a right of privacy is constitutionally guaranteed are clearly distinguishable on their facts. The only one that even superficially might be regarded as an analogy to support appellee's position here is Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965). Griswold stands only for the proposition that a law outlawing the use of contraceptives, enforcement of which would require invasion of the marital bedroom, transgressed on the intimacies of and the right of privacy inherent in the marital relationship, including the sexual relationship. The Texas and Georgia abortion statutes do not affect the sexual relationships of husband and wife. Moreover, in Griswold the Court was not called upon to choose between the right to privacy and the right to life, the choice it must make in this case. Nor can it seriously be argued that abortion, a crime at common law, is a fundamental, albeit "penumbral," liberty reserved by the Ninth Amendment.

III.

This Court's decision in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971) is dispositive of the appellants' claims that the Texas and Georgia statutes are unconstitutionally vague. Doctors are neither in doubt nor in fear as to where abortions permitted by those statutes end and where those barred by them begin.

IV.

A. In both cases appellants urge that the particular statute "chills and deters plaintiffs from practicing their profession as medical practitioners and thus offends rights guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments." However, neither statute proscribes speech or medical advice but merely prohibits the commission of the criminal acts specified. If the acts outlawed by the statutes are within the constitutional competency of Texas and Georgia to proscribe as criminal conduct, then the argument is closed.. Criminal acts do not fall within the freedom of speech which the First Amendment protects. The same rationale also answers appellants' claims that the freedom to pursue the profession of medicine guaranteed by the Due Process Clause is offended by the statutes involved in these cases.

B. Nor does the statute effect any invidious discrimination between rich and poor, as contended by the appellants. It applies to all persons committing the acts condemned by it and there is no suggestion that it seeks to discriminate on any invidious basis, including that of income. Even if it is true that the rich are in a better position to go to a jurisdiction where abortions are legal or to engage the services of more sympathetic physicians, the answer would be no different. There is no requirement of equal protection that all evils of the same genus be eradicated, or none at all. If the law in this instance, as in so many others, bears more oppressively on the less financially fortunate, the remedy lies in the elimination of the causes of poverty and the reform of the administration of criminal justice, not by the selective invalidation of otherwise lawfully enacted statutes.

C. Appellants also argue that the common welfare would be better served by more relaxed abortion laws. They profess concern about the unsafe conditions which surround criminal abortions and also claim to be moved by the problem of world overpopulation. Whatever the efficacy of such arguments, it is to the Congress, not to this Court, that they should be directed. Apart from that, however, the amicus questions their persuasiveness. The evidence is that liberalization of abortion laws has effected no substantive reduction in the rate of illegal abortions in other countries, so all that is done is to increase the total number of abortions. Finally, so far as the problem of overpopulation is concerned, an abortion, whether on the free demand of a woman or pursuant to the intimidating command of the state, appears to us as a singularly ineffective, and indeed extremely dangerous, way to attempt to solve the population problem, at least in the context of the humanistic values traditional to Western Civilization. In any event, this Court is not the forum, and these cases are not the occasion, to debate whether unrestricted abortion would best serve the general welfare of the people of Texas and Georgia.

ARGUMENT

I.

BOTH COURTS SHOULD HAVE ABSTAINED FROM GRANTING DECLARATORY RELIEF

This amicus is primarily concerned about the ultimate disposition of the important constitutional issues which the appellants have attempted to raise in the two cases. Nevertheless, NRLC is also concerned that these issues not be determined either prematurely or disparately and in the context of litigation where federal jurisdiction, if not absent, rests on an uncertain or disputed basis. Parker v. County of Los Angeles, 338 U.S. 327, 333 (1949). This Court has postponed the question of jurisdiction in both cases. 402 U.S. 941 (1971). NRLC respectfully suggests, for the reasons set out below, that this Court should either: (1) note probable jurisdiction and vacate the orders entered by the courts below on the ground that they should have abstained from granting declaratory as well as injunctive relief, Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66, 72 (1971); or (2) dismiss both cases for want of a substantial federal question, in that the judgments entered below do not constitute final determinations of federal constitutional rights. Public Service Commission v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 247 (1952).

A. The Texas Three-Judge Federal Court Should Have Abstained from Granting Declaratory Relief. One of the plaintiffs in the Texas case was a doctor who was permitted to intervene on the ground that he had been charged with violating the Texas abortion statute in two cases "now pending in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas. . . ." (App. 22).[2] Last Term, this Court held that federal courts should not exercise jurisdiction to enjoin pending state criminal prosecutions except under extraordinary circumstances where the danger of irreparable loss is both great and immediate in that there is a threat to the plaintiff's federally protected rights which cannot be eliminated by his defense of a criminal prosecution brought against him. Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971). Speaking for a majority of the Court, Mr. Justice Black pointed out that the ancient doctrine of equitable abstention which grew up in the British judicial system "is equally important under our Constitution, in order to prevent erosion of the role of the jury and avoid a duplication of legal proceedings and legal sanctions where a single suit would be adequate to protect the rights asserted."[3]

Continuing, he said:

> ". . . This underlying reason for restraining courts of equity from interfering with criminal prosecutions is reinforced by an even more vital consideration, the notion of 'comity,' that is, a proper respect for state functions, a recognition of the fact that the entire country is made up of a Union of separate state governments, and a continuance of the belief that the National Government will fare best if the States and their institutions are left free to perform their separate functions in their separate ways. This, perhaps for lack of a better and clearer way to describe it, is referred to by many as 'Our Federalism,' and one familiar with the profound debates that ushered our Federal Constitution into existence is bound to respect those who remain loyal to the ideals and dreams of 'Our Federalism.' The concept > does not mean blind deference to 'States' Rights' any more than it means centralization of control over every important issue in our National Government and its courts. The Framers rejected both these courses. What the concept does represent is a system in which there is sensitivity to the legitimate interests of both State and National Governments, and in which the National Government, anxious though it may be to vindicate and protect federal rights and federal interests, always endeavors to do so in ways that will not unduly interfere with the legitimate activities of the States."[4]

The Younger case is square authority in support of the refusal of the Texas three-judge federal court to grant the injunction requested by the appellants. In this case, as in Younger, criminal prosecutions were pending involving one of the plaintiffs. Moreover, in both cases, there is no showing that a situation exists "in which defense of the State's criminal prosecution will not assure adequate vindication of constitutional rights." Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 485-86 (1965). However, the three-judge federal court in the Texas case, despite its refusal to issue an injunction, did grant a declaratory judgment striking down the Texas abortion statute as unconstitutional under the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments and on grounds of vagueness under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. 314 F. Supp., at 1225. Here, the court below erred; it should have abstained from the grant of such relief.

On the same day that this Court decided Younger v. Harris, it handed down its opinion in Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66 (1971). There, the Court held that the same principles which govern the propriety of issuing federal injunctions against state court criminal proceedings also apply to the granting of federal declaratory judgments. In

Samuels, the appellants had been indicted under New York's Criminal Anarchy Law. They brought an action seeking declaratory as well as injunctive relief against their prosecutions on the ground that the statute violated the First and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution of the United States. A three-judge district court upheld the law and dismissed the complaints on the merits. After sustaining the lower court's refusal to grant injunctive relief, this Court held that the decision below should be affirmed but on the ground that "relief by way of declaratory judgment should have been denied without consideration of the merits." 401 U.S., at 73. Speaking for the Court, Mr. Justice Black said that:

> ". . . in cases where the state criminal prosecution was begun prior to the federal suit, the same equitable principles relevant to the propriety of an injunction must be taken into consideration by federal district courts in determining whether to issue a declaratory judgment, and that where an injunction would be impermissible under these principles, declaratory relief should ordinarily be denied as well."[5]

A majority of the Court thus discerned no difference between the propriety of issuing declaratory relief as opposed to injunctive relief where a "criminal proceeding was begun prior to the federal civil suit . . . ." In both situations, "deeply rooted and long settled principles of equity have narrowly restricted the scope for federal intervention, and ordinarily a declaratory judgment will result in precisely the same interference with and disruption of state proceedings that the long standing policy limiting injunctions was designed to avoid." 401 U.S., at 72.

The efficacy of a policy which restricts the grant of federal declaratory relief as well as the issuance of an injunction when criminal proceedings are threatened or, as in the Texas case, in existence at the time a civil suit is filed is further demonstrated when we consider the inequity and procedural awkwardness of the situation facing the State of Texas, which lost on the merits in the court below. It is settled that neither the grant nor the refusal of a declaratory judgment, without more, will support a direct appeal to this Court under 28 U.S.C. 1253. Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U.S. 427 (1970); Gunn v. University Committee, 399 U.S. 383 (1970). The State of Texas, therefore, has only one avenue through which to appeal directly the declaratory judgment voiding its abortion statute and that is to the Fifth Circuit and, if unsuccessful there, by attempting to invoke the certiorari jurisdiction of this Court.[6] Rarely has this Court tolerated the unnecessary bifurcation of constitutional litigation. Yet, should the Court hold in this case that the three-judge court properly granted declaratory relief but improperly denied injunctive relief, it then might be faced at least indirectly, as we now show, with consideration and decision of the same constitutional issues that are being directly raised by the appellees in the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

As stated, Texas is foreclosed from any direct appeal to this Court of the decision of the three-judge court in declaring its abortion statute unconstitutional. However, if this Court finds that the lower court acted properly in taking jurisdiction and deciding the case on the merits, then Texas presumably would argue that the court below did not err in refusing to grant injunctive relief. Under the rule that permits an appellee, even though he has not cross-appealed, to urge in support of the judgment under review any grounds which were fairly presented but ignored or rejected by the trial court, Texas could maintain that the three-judge court acted properly since the statute in question did not trespass upon any fundamental constitutional rights. Helvering v.

[6]The Texas defendants have appealed to the U. S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit (App. 135). On October 29, 1970 a panel of the Fifth Circuit granted plaintiffs' motion holding the defendants' appeal in that court in abeyance pending the decision of this Court in the case at bar (App. 140).

Lerner Stores Co., 314 U.S. 463, 467 (1941); United States v. American Ry. Exp. Co., 265 U.S. 425, 435 (1924). Yet, there would appear to be definite limits on the ability of the Texas appellee to argue the constitutional validity of the statute in contending that injunctive relief was properly withheld. Compare Penfield Co. v. S.E.C., 330 U.S. 585, 594 (1947), with Lukas v. Alexander, 279 U.S. 573 (1928). Texas' position must be that the three-judge court did not err in declining to issue an injunction, but that it declined to do so for the wrong reasons. That is, the court below correctly refused an injunction because the Texas statute did not violate the constitutional rights of any of the appellants, even though the same lower court had held, by way of declaratory judgment, that the statute did violate such constitutional rights! The fact that the Texas litigation, and the Georgia case as well, if permitted to go forward in this Court, might evolve to the posture just described, where the state is forced to argue that the lower court was right but for the wrong reasons, seriously suggests that the important substantive constitutional issues which inhere in this litigation first should be subjected to consideration and determination either by (1) the courts of Georgia, or (2) the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, and should not be considered, even indirectly, by this Court, at this time and on this appeal.

For these additional reasons, we contend that the holding in Samuels v. Mackell, supra, is applicable here and that the court below should have abstained from exercising jurisdiction or, in the alternative, should have stayed further proceedings pending the outcome of the criminal prosecutions already under way in the Texas courts.

B. The Georgia Three-Judge Federal Court Also Should Have Abstained from Granting Declaratory Relief. While the general principles of abstention that, in our view, should be controlling in the Texas case also should be applicable in the Georgia case, there is a factual difference between the two. So far as the record in the Georgia case shows, no criminal prosecutions were pending at the time appellants' civil action was brought, although, according to the complaint filed in the Georgia case, the doctor-plaintiffs alleged a "threat of . . . prosecution" under the statute which deterred them "from exercising their rights of free speech . . ." (App. 14). Does this factual distinction between the two cases argue for a different jurisdictional result in the Georgia litigation? For the reasons stated, we think not.

In the Younger case, the majority opinion said: "We express no view about the circumstances under which federal courts may act when there is no prosecution pending in state courts at the time the federal proceeding is begun."[7] In our view, the Georgia case appears to raise the precise issue that this Court deliberately left unresolved in Younger.

There are several situations in which a three-judge federal court should have the duty to act against a state criminal statute, whether or not criminal proceedings are pending. One of these is where the statute on its face will have the inevitable effect of "chilling" or deterring the exercise of fundamental constitutional rights guaranteed by the First Amendment, as made applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment. Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479, 489-90 (1965). Another area where federal courts should be free to act, whether or not state court criminal proceedings are pending, is where a defendant's federal rights "will inevitably be denied by the very act of bringing the defendant to trial in the state court." City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U.S. 808, 828 (1968). Neither circumstance exists here. As the three-judge court said in the Texas case: "We do not believe that plaintiffs can seriously argue that the . . . Abortion Laws are vulnerable 'on their face as abridging free expression'." 314 F.Supp., at 1224. Nor is there any suggestion in this record that the mere initiation of a criminal prosecution by the State of Georgia under its statute, by itself, would "inevitably" deny any rights of those made defendants in such a proceeding. In addition, as we have argued earlier in this brief, should this Court sustain the propriety of the three-judge federal court's grant of declaratory judgment, while at the same time leaving the state to pursue its appeal through the Fifth Circuit, there again would be presented the cumbersome and, we believe, undesirable procedural situation where the same substantive constitutional issues were being litigated in two separate federal forums, albeit directly in one and indirectly in the other. Even apart from principles of equity, federalism and comity, sound judicial administration also argues against this Court's toleration of such instances of disparate adjudication of constitutional questions.

There is also the additional fact that the Georgia statute, which was only passed in 1968, has never been construed by the Georgia courts. One of the plaintiff's complaints was that the statute is unconstitutional because there is no "formal administrative procedure or body for establishing rules, regulations or official interpretation[8] of the provisions of said statute" (App. 14). If this Court must ultimately decide the validity of the Georgia statute under the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, it will undoubtedly be faced with the difficult duty of balancing any alleged rights of privacy possessed by pregnant women as opposed to the right to life possessed by an unborn child. That delicate task might be made easier if this Court had the benefit of an interpretation by the Supreme Court of Georgia as to the scope of the exception which the Georgia statute permits for aborting a pregnancy which "would seriously and permanently injure [the mother's] . . . health; . . . " Thus, an "underlying issue of state law" bears very pertinently on the alleged constitutional right which appellants claim a pregnant woman has to determine whether or not she wishes to carry an unborn baby to full term. McNeese v. Board of Education, 373 U.S. 668, 674 (1963).

[8]Emphasis supplied throughout this brief.

NRLC raises one final point in arguing that the proper course for the three-judge federal court would have been to abstain from the grant of declaratory, as well as injunctive, relief. That concerns the effect of the declaratory judgment that has been rendered in this case. If the provisions of the statute struck down in the declaratory judgment are now null and void, the same considerations which prompted this Court to uphold the abstention rule in the Younger and Samuels cases, supra, should apply. On the other hand, if the decision below is not determinative, if the state can institute criminal proceedings under the statute, despite its emasculation by the court below, and if a state court can take evidence and decide the matter afresh, then "the federal judgment serves no useful purpose as a final determination of [federal] rights." Public Service Commission v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 237, 247 (1952); Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66, 72 (1971); see also Great Lakes Co. v. Huffman, 319 U.S. 392 (1953).

Moreover, there has been no showing that the courts of Georgia are not open to the plaintiffs for testing their claim of deprivation of federal constitutional rights. This Court has recognized, and we do not dispute, that "Congress imposed the duty upon all levels of the federal judiciary to give due respect to a suitor's choice of a federal forum for the hearing and decision of his federal constitutional claims." Zwikler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241, 248 (1967). Nor are we arguing that the Georgia three-judge federal court should have abstained "simply to give state courts the first opportunity to vindicate the federal claim" of the appellants. McNeese v. Board of Education, 373 U.S. 668, 672 (1963). We do maintain, however, that the "special circumstances"[9] surrounding the challenge to the constitutionality of the Georgia abortion statute should have led the three-judge federal court to abstain until the Georgia courts had had some reasonable opportunity to construe the statute, especially the exception for preserving the health of the mother which the Georgia law provides. Since the Georgia courts were available to the appellants for the vindication of constitutional rights which they attempt to bring to this Court for a final determination at this time, they would suffer no inequity, hardship or denial of fundamental constitutional rights by being required first to seek relief in such a forum. At the same time, requiring plaintiffs first to proceed in the Georgia courts would serve the principles of equitable abstention and federal comity on which this Court relied in its decisions in the Younger and Samuels cases, supra.

On May 17, 1971, this Court affirmed a three-judge federal court ruling that a physician who had performed an abortion but who had not been prosecuted under a Minnesota abortion law is not entitled to a federal court declaration against its enforcement when there was available a state statute under which declaratory relief could be obtained. Hodgson v. Randall, 314 F.Supp. 32 (D. Minn., 1970), aff'd, 402 U.S. 967 (1971). Again, on January 11, 1971, a three-judge federal district court in Arizona reached a similar result in dismissing an attack on Arizona statutes prohibiting criminal abortions. Planned Parenthood Association, et al. v. Nelson, et al., 327 F.Supp. 1290 (D. Ariz., 1971). In dismissing the suit, the Arizona court said:

> "Weighing the legitimate state and national interests involved in this case, and considering particularly the abstract nature of plaintiffs' complaint and the ready availability of state remedies, we find that the plaintiffs' need for a federal forum is not sufficiently great to override the interests of comity and justify federal interference with state activities."

The cases cited further support the amicus in urging that this Court vacate the decision of the Georgia three-judge federal court with directions to it that it either dismiss the complaint without prejudice or retain jurisdiction in the case pending a reasonable time for the plaintiffs to pursue their rights in a state court of appropriate jurisdiction. England v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 375 U.S. 411, 415-17 (1964).

Moreover, there is really no justification for a three-judge federal court to void a state criminal statute, under which no criminal prosecutions have yet been instituted, and at the same time to refuse to enjoin state officials from future enforcement of such a statute. It should be made clear that unconstitutional criminal statutes are also unenforceable. Therefore, the instant cases, we believe, present an opportunity for the Court to clarify some of the jurisdictional and procedural complexities which frequently arise when a three-judge federal court is permitted to grant declaratory relief, while eschewing the issuance of injunctive relief. NRLC respectfully urges that the Court use this opportunity to lay down rules or guidelines for observation by three-judge federal courts which, while protecting federal constitutional rights, will follow traditional principles of equitable abstention, serve the cause of federalism and comity and accord with sound principles of judicial administration when those principles must be applied to the adjudication of federal constitutional questions.

II.

NEITHER THE NINTH NOR THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT PROHIBITS A STATE FROM PROTECTING AGAINST THE DESTRUCTION OR ABORTION OF HUMAN LIFE

Assuming that this Court concludes that the courts below were correct in exercising jurisdiction in the pending cases and that these appeals, in their present posture, present substantial federal questions, it then must take up the appellants' claim that the lower courts erred in refusing to issue injunctive relief, after having granted declaratory judgments which, in one case, struck down the Texas statute and, in the other, voided the essential provisions of the Georgia act. NRLC further assumes that in resolving this claim the constitutionality of the two statutes must almost of necessity be resolved on their merits in the instant litigation. It is to these constitutional issues that the amicus now speaks in the remaining sections of its brief.

The primary or basic constitutional contention of the appellants is that both the Texas and Georgia statutes violate alleged rights of privacy guaranteed a woman by the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to abort a live fetus for any reason she asserts and in which her physician concurs. It is the position of the NRLC that any right to privacy which a woman possesses does not include the right to abort a live fetus. NRLC further argues that a state has a compelling interest to protect human life from unjustified destruction by abortion. In short, a state's important and compelling interest in protecting human life, in the form of a live fetus, justifies it in prohibiting abortions that destroy such a life, without demonstration of the strongest justification, such as abortion for the purpose of preserving another human life, i.e., that of the mother. We show in the immediately following sections of this brief the precise and compelling nature of a state's interest in prohibiting abortions except in circumstances where the mother's life would be endangered.

A. A State's Interest in Protecting the Rights of a Live Fetus Rests on a Now Indisputable Medical Basis. The compelling evidence of modern medical science which supports this proposition is set out in considerable length in the brief filed in these cases by the State of Texas. We believe that those findings are both clearly stated and irrefutable. Accordingly, we will resist the temptation to repeat them at any length in this brief. We would like to emphasize, however, that modern medicine has proved that life exists within the womb in the very earliest stages of pregnancy and that its findings to that effect should be of persuasive import in the resolution of the constitutional issues with which the Court is confronted, including any attempted balancing of alleged rights of privacy possessed by the mother on the one hand against the right to life possessed by a living fetus on the other. Thus, while avoiding any detailed repetition of Texas' thorough presentation to this Court, we now summarize the relevant evidence supplied by modern medical science.

Whatever might be the metaphysical view, it is beyond argument that legal concepts as to the nature and rights of an unborn child have drastically changed, based on expanding medical knowledge, over the last 2500 years. In the ancient world, a child in the womb was considered as part of his mother.[10] And up to the 17th Century it was prevailing doctrine, based upon Aristotle's notion, that 40 to 80 days after conception the fetus underwent a transformation that placed him in the human class. This notion was successfully demonstrated to be medical nonsense as early as 1621.[11] Thereafter, the medical profession gradually accepted the view that no valid line could be drawn within the womb. The law followed, but dragged considerably behind, the medical lead. For example, as recently as 1921, the Court of Appeals of New York, with Judge Cardozo dissenting, could hold that when "justice or convenience requires, the child in the womb is dealt with as a human being although physiologically it is part of the mother, . . ." Drobner v. Peters, 232 N.Y. 220, 133 N.E. 567, 568 (1921).

At this point in time, however, there is simply no respectable medical opinion supporting the ancient notion that a fetus is "part" of his mother. The unassailable medical evidence to the contrary has now been convincingly confirmed by the findings of the new science of fetology, which has received widespread recognition by virtue of Liley's work on blood transfusions in the fetus.[12] Some of [12]Liley's pioneering work not only has opened new avenues in the treatment of erythroblastosis fetalis, but has inspired the whole new sub-specialty of 'fetology' and created a need for fetological surgeons and fetological medical specialists for the future." the observations and opinions on the question held by the most eminent of doctors specializing in the field may be of interest to this Court, although, as stated, a much more comprehensive discussion of the medical evidence is to be found in the brief filed by the Texas appellants.

Professor Ashley Montagu of Columbia University has stated it very concisely:

> "The basic fact is simple: Life begins, not at birth, but at conception.
> "This means that a developing child is alive, not only in the sense that he is composed of living tissue, but also in the sense that from the moment of conception, things happen to him, even though he may be only two weeks old, and he looks more like a creature from another world than a human being—he reacts. In spite of his newness and his appearance, he is a living, striving human being from the very beginning."[13]

It is now undisputed, for example, that the new fetus possesses at the moment of conception a genetic code of its own which is the transmitter of all the potentialities that make men human, something that is not present in either the spermatozoon or ovum. Gottleib, Developmental Genetics 17 (1966). When conception takes place, scientists now generally agree "a new life begins—silent, secret, unknown."[14] Moreover,

> "The child may be parasitic and dependent, but it is a functioning unit, an independent life. A child is not, in the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, 'a part of its mother.' However visceral may be its temporary residence, however dependent it may be before birth—and for some years after birth—it is a living being, with its separate growth and development, with its separate nervous system and blood circulation, with its own skeleton and musculature, its brain and heart and vital organs."[15]

A most vivid description of the fetus within the womb is found in the report of Dr. Liley and his wife, both pioneers of the new science of fetology. In 1967 they said:

> "Because the fetus is benignly protected, warmed and nourished within the womb, it was long thought that the unborn must have the nature of a plant, static in habit and growing only in size. Recently through modern techniques of diagnosing and treating the unborn baby, we have discovered that little could be further from the truth.
>
> "The fluid that surrounds the human fetus at 3, 4, 5 and 6 months is essential to both its growth and its grace. The unborn's structure at this early stage is highly liquid, and although his organs have developed, he does not have the same relative bodily proportions that a newborn baby has. The head, housing the miraculous brain, is quite large in proportion to the remainder of the body and the limbs are still relatively small. Within his watery world, however (where we have been able to observe him in his natural state by closed circuit x-ray television set), he is quite beautiful and perfect in his fashion, active and graceful. He is neither an acquiescent vegetable nor a witless tadpole as some have conceived him to be in the past, but rather a tiny human being as independent as though he were lying in a crib with a blanket wrapped around him instead of his mother."[16]

These proven medical facts explain why the great majority of doctors, practicing their profession in good faith, treat the fetus or unborn child as a second patient, different from the mother. This is acceptable medical practice and is almost universally observed in the field of obstetrics. It may be the only area of medical practice where a doctor treats two patients at the same time, taking that unique fact into account in his treatment of both patients. This practice has been favorably noted in at least one reported decision. In Jones v. Jones, 208 Misc. 721, 144 N.Y. Supp.2d 820 (Sup. Ct., 1955), the court found that the unborn child:

> ". . . became a patient of the mother's obstetrician, as well as the mother herself. In so holding I can think of the infant as a third party beneficiary of the mother-doctor contract or perhaps a principal for whom the mother acted as agent."[17]

And it has been held that a child may recover damages for a prenatal injury suffered as the result of the negligence of his doctor. Sylvia v. Gobeille, 101 R.I. 76, 220 A.2d 222 (1966); Seattle-First National Bank v. Rankin, 59 Wash.2d 288, 367 P.2d 835 (1962).

However, NRLC sees no point in belaboring the scientifically obvious. Life begins at conception and for practical medical purposes can be scientifically verified within 14 days. Within three weeks, at a point much before "quickening" can be felt by the mother, the fetus manifests a working heart, a nerve system, and a brain different from and independent of the mother in whose womb he resides; the unborn fetus is now a living human being. It is universally agreed that life has begun by the time the mother realizes she is pregnant and asks her doctor to perform an abortion.

B. In Anglo-Saxon Law the State Has Always Had a Compelling Interest in Preventing the Destruction of Unborn Children. The appellants, and those allied with them as amici curiae in this case, are hard put to deny that a state has a grave and important interest in preventing the destruction of human life through unjustifiable abortion. However, they argue that even assuming such an interest, the abortion laws do not reflect that interest since, they claim, such laws were passed for another purpose, i.e., to protect the life and health of pregnant women who submit to illegal, and what once were highly dangerous, operations. Their position here crumbles before the thrust of the history of Anglo-Saxon law both in England and in this Country. That history shows conclusively that the protection of the life of the unborn child was always a major purpose, if not the paramount purpose, surrounding the enactment of the abortion laws in both England and the United States.

In Roman law the unborn child was deemed a part of his mother, and a parent had absolute dominion over his offspring. Fox, Abortion, a Question of Right or Wrong, 57 A.B.A. J. 667, 671 (1971). Due initially to the influence of ecclesiastical law and precedents, the Anglo-Saxon law of abortion developed in the other direction. The first reference to abortion in the English criminal law occurs in the writings of Bracton. He transposed the canon, Sicut ex, to England by saying that aborting a woman by blow or poison is homicide if the fetus were "formed and especially if it were ensouled."[18] Early in the 17th Century, Lord Coke repeats what Bracton said in a passage which begins: "If a woman be quick with child . . . this is a great misprision and so murder."[19] Coke's authority on this point has been questioned. If the word "ensouled" is translated as "alive", it could be argued that Coke may have mistranslated Bracton and as a result erroneously imposed the requirement that to constitute a felony a woman must be "quick" with child.[20] "Quickening", of course, is "the first motion of the fetus in the womb felt by the mother", and a "quick" child is defined as a child "that has developed so that it moves within the mother's womb."[21] However, Lord Coke more likely was taking into realistic account the practical difficulties, in view of the state of 17th Century medical knowledge, of proving that the act of an accused abortionist was the cause of a death of a live fetus. At that time, unless a child was born alive after an induced abortion, it would have been virtually impossible to prove that the abortional act caused his death since the fetus might have died in the womb from some other cause concurrent in time with the abortion. At English common law, for example, if a victim of an assault died after a year and a day following the assault, his assailant could not be convicted of homicide. Proof of causality between the assault and the death was precluded by the passage of time. Perkins, Criminal Law 28-29 (2d Ed., 1969). Under the circumstances, at this point in the development of the criminal law, it was understandable that the abortionist, as a defendant, should enjoy the benefit of doubt as to (a) whether the fetus was alive or dead, or even in existence, at the time of the alleged act, and (b) whether the abortional act, in fact, killed the fetus. On the other hand, when a pregnant woman was sentenced to be executed, the law held that she could not be executed for the crime until after birth, even though the child had not yet quickened. Regina v. Wycherly, 8 Car. & P. 262, 264, 173 Eng. Rep. 486-87 (Nisi Prius, 1838).[22] In the case of the pregnant woman scheduled for execution, the fetus as a possible innocent victim of the execution was entitled to the benefit of the doubt as to whether he was present and alive in the womb even though he had not manifested life by perceptible movement.

The first statutory regulation of abortion in England became effective in 1803. The statute made it a felony punishable by death to administer poison "to cause and procure the miscarriage of any woman then quick with child" and a felony punishable by fine, imprisonment, pillory, whipping or transportation to attempt by drug or instrument to procure the miscarriage of any woman "not being or not being proved to be quick with child."[23] Thus, in this first abortion statute, Parliament did away with any distinction in law, except for the punishment prescribed, between abortions occurring before quickening and those committed after quickening. The preamble to the 1803 Act explains the reason, saying that "no adequate means have hitherto been provided for the prevention and punishment of such offenses."[24]

At the time Lord Coke wrote, "quickening" of the child furnished the only positive proof to 17th Century men that it was alive within the womb. However, when Parliament turned to the regulation of abortion in the early 19th Century, medical science was able to supply proof of the existence of an animated fetus prior to the movement of the child within the womb first felt by the mother. At last, Parliament was able to make criminal that which was always regarded as an offense, evil or wrong but one incapable of being proved.[25]

In 19th Century America, the requirement of "quickening" hung on in some of the statutes, but a tendency soon was manifest for courts to interpret abortion statutes as applicable to any stage of the pregnancy.[26] Medical writers in this Country were critical of the retention of a distinction between abortions based on the presence or absence of quickening. In 1887, a distinguished doctor wrote:

> "This fallacious idea that there is no life until quickening takes place has been the foundation of, and formed the basis of, and has been the excuse to ease or appease the guilty conscience which had led to the destruction of thousands of human lives."[27]

During the course of the 19th Century, the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association several times called on the states to reform their laws to prevent abortion.[28] In 1859, a Committee on Criminal Abortion of the American Medical Association obtained unanimous adoption of a resolution which condemned abortion at every period of gestation except as necessary for preserving the life of either the mother or child. The reason for the resolution was stated to be the increasing frequency "of such unwarrantable destruction of human life."[29]

In summary, from Bracton's day abortion was regarded at common law as a serious evil or wrong which should be prevented in order to curtail or prevent the unnecessary destruction of human life. For a brief period, difficulties of proving that abortion had in fact caused the termination of an "unquick" child prevented application of the serious sanctions of the criminal law to some cases. When medical science eliminated those difficulties of factual proof, there was no longer any question but that one of the prime purposes of the abortion statutes then on the books, or subsequently enacted, was to prevent the destruction of the unborn fetus at all stages of gestation. Therefore, the compelling interest which the States of Texas and Georgia both have in prohibiting and regulating unjustifiable abortions is not one newly discovered, or advanced as an afterthought argument. It is true that the findings of modern fetology help demonstrate the cruel and distasteful nature of the abortion of a human fetus more vividly than previously had been known. Nevertheless, the state's legitimate interest in preventing the infliction of such carnage on unborn children has never been open to serious debate.

However, even if it were true that the compelling state interest in preventing or regulating abortion is an interest arising only recently as a result of the findings and research of modern medicine, no different legal conclusions should result. The fact that a statute or law may originally have been enacted to serve one purpose does not serve to condemn it when the same statute, with the passage of time, serves another equally valid public purpose, such as preventing the destruction of the life of an unborn child.[30] Both Texas and Georgia still could claim that their respective statutes serve a compelling state interest than of which there are few higher, i.e., outlawing the unjustifiable taking of human life.

In the next several sections of this brief, the amicus shows that during the same period in which the criminal law of abortion developed, other areas of the law also manifested concomitant concerns for important subsidiary rights of unborn children derivative from their right to life. These are their rights of contract, tort and parental support.

C. The Law's Recognition of the Property Rights of an Unborn Child. The first area where the rights of the unborn child, at all stages of fetal existence, were recognized by the law was in the realm of property law. In Doe v. Clarke, 2 H. Bl. 399, 126 Eng. Rep. 617 (1795), the court interpreted the ordinary meaning of "children" in a will to include a child in the womb: "An infant en ventre sa mere, who by the course and order of nature is then living, comes clearly within the description of 'children living at the time of his decease'." In Thelluson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 227, 31 Eng. Rep. 117 (1798), the court rejected the contention that this was a mere rule of construction invoked for the benefit of the child: "Why should not children en ventre sa mere be considered generally as in existence. They are entitled to all the privileges of other persons." Id., at 323. To the argument that such a child was a nonentity it replied:

> "Let us see, what this non-entity can do. He may be vouched in a recovery, though it is for the purpose of making him answer over in value. He may be an executor. He may take under the statute of distributions. He may take by devise. He may be entitled under a charge for raising portions. He may have an injunction; and he may have a guardian." Id., at 322.

When the English property rules were adopted by American courts, the same approach was taken. In Hall v. Hancock, 15 Pick. 255 (Mass., 1834), the issue was whether a bequest to grandchildren "living at my decease" was valid, and the court was asked to say that "in esse" was not the same as "living" and that for a child to be "living," the mother must be at least "quick".[31] Chief Justice Shaw held that a conceived child fell within the meaning of the language and quoted with approval Lord Hardwicke in Wallis v. Hodson, 2 Atk. 117: "The principal reason I go upon is, that a child en ventre sa mere is a person in rerum natura, so that, both by the rules of the civil and common law, he is to all intents and purposes a child, as much as if born in the father's lifetime."

In In Re Well's Will, 221 N.Y.S. 417 (1927), a trust fund originating from the estate of the deceased was to be divided into "as many parts as I have grandchildren living at the date of my decease." The decedent died on May 22, 1922; a granddaughter of the decedent was conceived on May 1, 1922. The granddaughter was held to be entitled to a share in the trust estate. See also Swain v. Bowers, 91 Ind. 307, 158 N.E. 598 (1927).[32]

In the case of La Blue v. Specker, 358 Mich. 558, 100 N.W.2d 445 (1960), an unborn illegitimate child was held to be a child or "other person" having standing to bring suit under a dram shop act, for the death of his father, which had occurred before the child's birth. Quoting from Ide v. Scott Drilling Co., Inc., 341 Mich. 164, 67 N.W.2d 133 at 135, the court in the La Blue case stated:

> "For certain purposes, indeed for all beneficial purposes, a child en ventre sa mere is to be considered as born . . . . It is regarded as in esse for all purposes beneficial to itself, but not to another. . . . Formerly, this rule would not be applied if the child's interests would be injured . . . thereby, but for purposes of the rule against perpetuities such a child is now considered a life in being, even though it is prejudiced by being considered born . . . . Its civil rights are protected at every period of gestation."[33]

The foregoing approach has not been a sentimental concession to the supposed benefit of some forgotten posthumous child. The rule has been applied even where its application benefited some third party, Barnett v. Pinkston, 238 Ala. 327, 191 So. 371 (1939), and also in cases where the child himself has been injured by the rule, In re Sankey's Estate, 199 Cal. 391, 249 P. 517 (1926), in which a child conceived but not born was held bound by a decree entered against the living heirs.

[32]The English and American common law doctrine under which an unborn child is considered as a "child" or as "in existence" for purposes of inheritance and trusts also has long been followed in the District of Columbia. Craig v. Rowland, 10 App. D.C. 402 (1897). The rule was recently applied in Riggs National Bank v. Summerlin, et al., C.A. 187-69, Memo. Opinion (D. D.C., 1969).

[33]100 N.W.2d, at 449.

This amicus believes that it would be an ironic and an inexplicable perversion of both human and constitutional values if it were to be the law that the state has an interest in protecting the property rights of an unborn child, but has no constitutionally justifiable interest in regulating the circumstances and conditions under which such a child may be destroyed, i.e., put out of existence and denied further life as a human being. Nor is it any answer to reply that the property rights of a fetus which are protected by the state are merely contingent and depend upon his having been born. It is only the remedy, not the right, which is contingent. Existence as an unborn child is the basis of the state's interest in granting and protecting the property rights of an unborn child. The fact that the child may not survive to enjoy those rights does not denigrate the state's interest or deny its authority to implement that interest by law. We should assume that the proposition would have special applicability when the state's interests and action are directed at insuring that the existence of life of the unborn child, and all such contingently enforceable property rights as he may possess, are not exterminated by his deliberate destruction, at least short of an overwhelming countervailing interest such as the protection of the life of another human being–the mother.

D. Evolving Rights Afforded an Unborn Child in the Law of Torts. Perhaps even more demonstrably so than in the case of purely property rights, including rights of inheritance, it is in the law of torts where we witness a dramatic development, indeed, an abrupt change, of the law in response to expanding scientific knowledge and medical facts formerly unavailable.

Well into the 20th Century most American decisions denied recovery in tort to the human offspring harmed in the womb. The denial was based in part on the danger of fraudulent claims, in part on the difficulty of proving causation, but principally on the ground that "the defendant could owe no duty of conduct to a person who was not in existence at the time of his action," Prosser on Torts,

Sec. 56 (1964). The theory followed was that succinctly expressed by Justice Holmes in Dietrich v. Northhampton, 138 Mass. 14, 17 (1884): "The unborn child was a part of the mother at the time of the injury."

There is no doubt of the sweeping nature of the reversal of the Dietrich doctrine that the unborn child is a part of the mother and therefore cannot sue for pre-natal injuries. Almost every jurisdiction which has considered the issue in the last 30 years has upheld the right of an infant to sue for injuries sustained prior to his birth. Prosser on Torts, Sec. 56; Gordon, The Unborn Plaintiff, 63 Mich. L.R. 579, 627 (1965). Moreover, it appears that a majority of jurisdictions now recognize that a wrongful death action may be brought for negligently inflicted injury to the unborn child resulting in its death, whether or not it was viable at the time of the injury, and whether born alive or still born. Torigian v. Watertown News Co., 352 Mass. 446, 225 N.E.2d 926, 927 (1967); Harper and James, Torts, Sec. 18.3 (1956).

Many of the early cases required that the unborn child have reached the stage of viability (i.e., capable of living outside of the mother's uterus) at the time the injuries were inflicted in order to maintain an action.[34] The modern trend, and more in accord with the medical facts, however, has been to reject any distinction based on viability and to allow recovery whenever the injury was received, provided that the elements of causation are properly established.[35]

The District of Columbia 25 years ago repudiated the notion that an unborn child must be considered as part of his mother and unable to sue for prenatal injuries in Bonbrest v. Kotz, 65 F. Supp. 138 (D. D.C., 1946). The court pointed out in that case that under the civil law and the common law of real property a child en ventre sa mere is regarded "as a human being . . . from the moment of conception—which it is in fact." Referring to the state of medical knowledge in 1946 and noting the resilient, unstatic features of the common law of torts, it found no difficulty in upholding the right of an unborn child to sue for damages in tort. 65 F. Supp., at 142.[36]

Kelly v. Gregory, 282 App. Div. 542, 125 N.Y.S.2d 696, contains language which summarizes precisely the basis of the rejection on the part of modern tort law of the antiquated notion of the common law that an unborn child is merely part of his mother's body:

> "We ought to be safe in this respect in saying that legal separability should begin where there is biological separability. We know something more than the actual process of conception and foetal development now than when some of the common law cases were decided; and what we know makes it possible to demonstrate clearly that separability begins at conception.

> throughout its life. That it may not live if its protection and nourishment are cut off earlier than the viable stage of its development is not to destroy its separability; it is rather to describe the conditions under which life will not continue."[37]

Very recent demonstrations of the adaptability of the common law to the findings of modern medicine are furnished by two cases decided by the Supreme Court of Michigan. On June 1, 1971, that court repudiated the doctrine of stare decisis to hold, despite earlier precedents to the contrary, that a surviving child could recover for prenatal brain injuries suffered in an automobile accident occurring during the fourth month of pregnancy.[38] Little more than a month later, the Michigan Supreme Court, again departing from stare decisis and affirming the "wisdom of [a] public policy [which] regards unborn persons as being entitled to the protection of the law", held that the administrator of the estate of an unborn child is entitled to sue under the Michigan wrongful death statute for injuries which caused the death of an unborn 8-month infant en ventre sa mere.[39] In deciding the case, the Michigan Supreme Court noted rhetorically, but perceptively:

> "If property interests of unborn persons are protected by the law, how much more solicitous should the law be of the first unalienable right of man—the right to life itself?"[40]

At the present time the right to recover for prenatal injuries has been recognized by 30 states and the District of Columbia.[41] Compensation for prenatal injuries has also

Finally, an Ohio court has held an unborn child in the 24th week of gestation is a "person" within the meaning of a family compensation clause of an automobile liability insurance policy. Peterson v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., 26 Ohio App.2d 246, 197 N.E.2d 194 (1964). Is it possible for a human life to be both legally insurable and, as the appellants would have it, legally destructible at the same moment in time?

The emergence of the rights in tort of unborn children is referred to as a prime example of the effect of scientific development on law in the instructive book of Professor Patterson–Law In a Scientific Age (1963). He concludes: "that the meaning and scope of even such a basic term as 'legal person' can be modified by reason of changes in scientific facts–the unborn child has been recognized as a legal person, even in the law of torts."[42]

The revolution in tort law has thus, by the majority rule, recognized rights in the fetus at every stage of life and has refused to condition recovery on survivorship. The dean of authorities on tort law notes that all writers on the subject have maintained "that the unborn child in the path of an automobile is as much a person in the street as the mother." Prosser on Torts, Sec. 56. Can such a child become less a person when, instead of an automobile, another agency is directed to his destruction? If the state may protect this person by court action awarding damages for tort, a fortiori the state cannot be impotent to protect the same living being by criminal sanctions.

E. Equity and the Unborn Child. The emerging rights of unborn children to recover in tort have been matched by developing concern for their rights in equity. Decisions in this area bear not only on his right to parental support but on the fetus' right to life itself.

[42]Patterson, supra, at 5.

1. The Right to Parental Support

It is now established that the law will recognize an unborn child's right to support by his parents. Kyne v. Kyne, 38 Cal. App.2d 122, 100 P.2d 806 (1940), involved a suit brought by the guardian ad litem of a fetus against the natural father. At the time the suit was instituted, the unborn child was less than six months old. The court held that both the father and mother of such a child owed him the duty of support. See also People v. Yates, 114 Cal. App. Supp. 782, 298 P. 961 (1931), and People v. Estergard, ___ Colo. ___, 457 P.2d, at 698, 699 (1969). If the law holds that a state has sufficient justification to require a father to support an unborn child which he may not want, it cannot be true that the state has no justifiable interest in protecting that child from extinction as a living being where his mother may not want him.

2. The Right to Life

Since this Court's decision in Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), it has been firmly settled that the Free Exercise of Religion rights guaranteed by the First Amendment (as incorporated in the Fourteenth Amendment) are "susceptible of restriction only to prevent grave and immediate danger to interests which the state may lawfully protect." 319 U.S., at 639. Nevertheless, the right of an unborn child to life has served in several recent instances to permit the state's abridgement of or interference with a mother's religious convictions, when necessary to save the life of an unborn child. One case touching upon, but not deciding, the point was decided in the District of Columbia. In Application of the President and Directors of Georgetown College, Inc., 331 F.2d 1000 (C.A. D.C., 1964), cert. den., 377 U.S. 978 (1964), the Court of Appeals upheld an order of the District Court authorizing a hospital to administer a blood transfusion to a woman patient who, on religious grounds, was unwilling to consent to the transfusion and where the husband also was unwilling to consent, where the transfusion was necessary to save her life. The adamant mother had a seven-month-old child at the time the terrible dilemma arose. In resolving this Hobson's choice, Judge Wright said:

> "The child cases point up another consideration. The patient, 25 years old, was the mother of a seven-month-old child. The state, as parens patriae, will not allow a parent to abandon a child, and so it should not allow this most ultimate of voluntary abandonment. The patient had a responsibility to the community to care for her infant. Thus the people had an interest in preserving the life of this mother."[43]

Other crucial decisions bearing directly on the unborn child's right to life have been handed down during the past decade. In one such case, where there was a possibility that a child might be born with a possibly fatal blood condition, a New Jersey juvenile court held that the state, in the interests of the child's welfare, had a right to authorize the hospital to give life-saving transfusions, even though the parents objected on religious grounds.[44] The court made it clear that the state, pursuant to its parens patriae jurisdiction, not only had a right but also a duty to protect children within its jurisdiction–including an unborn child–notwithstanding the wishes of his parents.

More precisely in point is Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Memorial Hospital v. Anderson, 42 N.J. 421, 201 A.2d 537 (1964), cert. den., 377 U.S. 985 (1964). There, a court was asked to decide whether the rights of a child in the mother's womb were violated by her refusal, on religious grounds, to submit to a blood transfusion necessary to preserve the lives of both. The New Jersey court found it unnecessary to decide whether an adult may be compelled to submit to medical treatment necessary to save his own life. However, the court had no difficulty, after finding a parity of rights possessed by both unborn and after born children, in deciding that the unborn child was entitled to the law's protection and ordering the transfusion. In sustaining the unborn child's right to life, even over his mother's right to practice her religion, the court said:

> "In State v. Perricone, 37 N.J. 463, 181 A.2d 751 (1963), we held that the State's concern for the welfare of an infant justified blood transfusions notwithstanding the objection of its parents who were also Jehovah's Witnesses, and in Smith v. Brennan, 31 N.J. 533, 157 A.2d 497 (1960), we held that a child could sue for injuries inflicted upon it prior to birth. We are satisfied that the unborn child is entitled to the law's protection and that an appropriate order should be made to insure blood transfusions to the mother in the event that they are necessary in the opinion of the physician in charge at the time." (201 A.2d, at 538)[45]

Also worthy of note in the context of a claim of a mother's right to freedom over the use of her body is Gleitman v. Cosgrove, 49 N.J. 22, 227 A.2d 689 (1967). In that case, the plaintiffs sought damages against doctors who had attended the mother during pregnancy. They alleged their child had been born with birth defects and that the defendants had negligently failed to warn the child's mother and father that an attack of German measles which she suffered during pregnancy might result in such defects. The failure to give the warning, it was alleged, deprived the parties of the opportunity of terminating the pregnancy. In affirming the trial court's dismissal of the complaint, the majority of the New Jersey Supreme Court emphasized the child's right not to be aborted, saying:

This Court too has had no trouble in sustaining as superior a state's interest in, and authority with respect to, children over their parents' free exercise of religion rights, noting that the "right to practice religion freely does not include liberty to expose . . . the child . . . to ill health or death." Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166-67 (1943).

> "The right to life is inalienable in our society . . . . We are not faced here with the necessity of balancing the mother's life against that of her child. The sanctity of the single human life is the decisive factor in this suit in tort. Eugenic considerations are not controlling. We are not talking here about the breeding of prize cattle. It may have been easier for the mother and less expensive for the father to have terminated the life of their child while he was an embryo, but these alleged detriments cannot stand against the preciousness of a single human life to support a remedy in tort. Cf. > "Though we sympathize with the unfortunate situation in which these parents find themselves, we firmly believe the right of their child to live is greater than and precludes their right not to endure emotional and financial injury."[46]

The line of cases discussed in this section of the amicus' brief, all of which are based either impliedly or expressly on the findings of modern medical science concerning the nature of the fetus, is a recognition of the right of a child in the womb to the protection of the law. From this, a learned commentator has gone on to reason that:

> ". . . it seems established by analogy that to remove the protection of the criminal law from the child in the womb would be itself an unconstitutional act. The civil rights cases have established that for the Government to fail to protect a class is itself an unconstitutional denial of civil rights."[47]

In point of fact, if the issue had been raised in these cases, this amicus would be arguing that both due process and equal protection of law should prevent a state from permitting the abortion of a live fetus, except when necessary to save the life of the mother.[48] "Once human life has commenced, the constitutional protections found in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments impose upon the state the duty of safeguarding it." Steinberg v. Rhodes, et al., 321 F. Supp. 741 (N.D. Ohio, 1970). At the minimum, NRLC would contend, as suggested by several scholars in the field, that the unborn child is entitled to the traditional protections of due process, including representation by counsel at some type of adversarial hearing, before he is doomed to death either at his mother's whim or upon her physician's unreviewable moral-medical judgment that his life is less important than his mother's state of mind.[49] Some doctors might balk at that suggestion because of the technicalities and delays which observance of due process of law sometimes entails. The same argument is often made by prosecutors faced with claims of Fourth, Fifth or Sixth Amendment rights, but in neither case is the position a valid one. The legitimacy of an abortion operation is more than merely a medical decision; it involves legal, moral, ethical, philosophical, theological, sociological and psychological considerations. These realities cannot be brushed aside merely by calling the problem "medical". Moreover, the primary training and function of physicians is to diagnose and heal, not to adjudicate.[50] And if war is too important to be entrusted solely to the generals, the ultimate issues of life and death are too important to be entrusted solely to the surgeons. Both logic and experience warrant the presumption that the unborn child would want his chance at life.[51] Surely, the ingenuity of American law for fashioning procedural protections when constitutional rights are threatened justifies optimism that our legal system could be utilized to provide such protections for the unborn child faced with destruction, but who, at the present time, has no voice to plead his case and no forum in which to make it.

However, as we have said, the due process argument need not be pressed in the instant litigation since the issue has not been raised by any of the parties. Nevertheless, the point has relevancy. It serves to emphasize that in evaluating the legitimacy of any alleged right to privacy on the part of a pregnant woman to destroy her unborn child the Court must take into countervailing account the fundamental right of that child to be protected by the State from arbitrary and capricious destruction of its existence merely because it is unwanted.

F. Life Should Take Constitutional Precedence over Privacy. In this section of its brief, the amicus discusses the judicial balancing which necessarily is involved in weighing competing claims of an unborn child's right to life and the alleged right of privacy which appellants and their allies in these cases assert is possessed by all pregnant women. In deciding the relative priority which the Constitution should afford, on the one hand, to a woman's right to destroy her unborn child and, on the other, to the right of that child to live, certain relevant facts are beyond argument. First, the medical evidence is unchallengeable—life begins at conception, and from that point on the fetus has a living existence, including a heart and a brain, separate and independent from his mother. Secondly, as NRLC previously has shown, the common law has not been impervious to the findings of modern science in changing and adjusting its concepts and rules regarding the legal rights possessed by a child in the womb. Supra, pp. 32-36.

be born. Think of it! It was a miracle! Time Magazine, Feb. 25, 1960, p. 86.

We might also add at this point that the approach taken by American law in recognizing important legal rights of an unborn child is not some national aberration explained, perhaps, by some latent puritanical instincts in American society alone. For example, in 1959 the United Nations adopted a "Declaration of the Rights of the Child" which supplemented the United Nations' statement entitled the "Universal Declaration of Human Rights". One reason for this supplementary declaration, as stated in its Preamble, was because, "the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth." General Assembly of the United Nations, "Declaration of the Rights of the Child", adopted unanimously in the plenary meeting of November 20, 1959, Official Records of the General Assembly, 14th Session, pp. 19-20. Thus, the representatives of most of the civilized nations of the world recognized that the being before birth deserved recognition as a "child". They further recognized that a child, so defined, needed special legal protection. The committee report on this declaration noted that "representatives of the most diametrically-opposed social systems find common ideals in discussing the privileges of childhood". Report of the Third Committee of the General Assembly, Official Records, 14th Session, p. 593. The committee thus underlined that the rights asserted by the United Nations as applicable to the fetus represented a commitment which had commended itself to all of the various social systems represented within that worldwide body.

If, then, an unborn child can inherit by will and by intestacy, be the beneficiary of a trust, be tortiously injured, be represented by a guardian seeking present support from the parent, be preferred to the religious liberties of his parents, be protected by the criminal statutes on parental neglect, and enjoy the specific concern of the United Nations' General Assembly, are there not interests here which the State may guard from intentional extinction? If not, then all of these rights are meaningless, capable of being destroyed through the exercise of an unrestrictable right simply to destroy their possessor—the unborn fetus.

Let us then address ourselves specifically to the question of balancing the two rights which may appear to be in conflict in these cases. That question must be: To what extent can the State protect the right of an unborn infant to continue its existence as a living being in the face of a claim of right of privacy on the part of a woman to decide whether or not she wishes to remain with child?

This Court has decided that the Constitution protects certain rights of privacy on the part of a woman arising from the marital relationship which cannot be unjustifiably interferred with by the State. NRLC believes that the genesis of such rights, to the extent such rights may exist, must be found among the "penumbral" personal liberties protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. Yet equally unchallengeable is the proposition that an unborn child's right not to "be deprived of life", to quote the words of the the Due Process Clause itself, is also a fundamental personal right or liberty protected by that same amendment and entitled to the traditional searching judicial scrutiny and review afforded when basic personal liberties are threatened by state action, whether legislative or judicial in character. Therefore, it is very clear that this case is not one, as the appellants would portray it, which involves merely the balancing of a right of personal liberty (i.e., a married woman's privacy) against some competing, generalized state interest of lower priority or concern in an enlightened scheme of constitutional values, such as the state's police power.[52] Here, the Court must choose between a nebulous and undefined legal "right" of privacy on the part of a woman with respect to the use of her body and the State's right to prevent the destruction of a human life. That election involves the determination as to whether the State's judgment that human life is to be preferred is a prohibited exercise of legislative power.

[52] Even in this area the Court, by closely divided vote, has held that a "dependent child's needs are paramount" and rarely are to be placed in "a position secondary to what the mother claims as her rights". Wyman v. James, 400 U.S. 309, 318 (1971).

There would be no question of the answer, of course, if the choice were between a woman's "right to privacy" and the destruction of an unwanted after born child. Yet abortion is distinguishable from infanticide only by the event of birth. The recent findings of medical science now suggest that any distinction, at least from a medical if not a legal point of view, disappears very early in a woman's pregnancy and in the life of the unborn child within the womb. Contrary to the appellants' assumption in these cases, a state's interest in regulating abortion is not bottomed exclusively on concern for the health of the mother, a concern which admittedly would be of less than persuasive effect, since it cannot be successfully established that abortions during the early period of pregnancy performed by competent physicians in hospital surroundings represent a substantially high medical risk to the life and health of the mother.[53] The state interest which justifies what Texas and Georgia have done rests on a concern for human life, even though that life be within the womb of the mother. Such an interest on the part of the State has existed since the common law of England. Now the separate, early and independent existence of fetal life has been conclusively proven by medical science. While it may be impossible for the State to insist on maintaining such a life under all circumstances, can it seriously be maintained that the Government is powerless to insist on protecting it from intentional destruction, absent danger to the mother's life.

Under the analysis set out above, the appellant's argument in support of a woman's "sovereignty . . . over the use of her body" cannot stand. Either (1) the argument means that she has a "private right" or personal freedom which permits her to decide, for any reason whatsoever, whether to sustain and support, or whether to eliminate, a life which she alone may decide is unwanted; or (2) it means that she has some kind of right to bodily integrity which permits her and her alone to decide under all circumstances whether to retain, or permit to be destroyed, a human life contained within her own body.

[53]The amicus has one reservation here, however. Evolving research into the complications that may follow abortion indicates a 2% sterility rate with an approximate 10% rate of moderate or severe psychic sequelae. Hellegers, Abortion, the Law, and the Common Good, 3 Medical Opinion and Review, No. 5 (May 1967). Indeed, respectable studies raise the question of whether the guilt complex evoked by an abortion may itself constitute a more severe psychiatric problem than any pre-existing mental health problem serving to justify the abortion in the first instance. Rosen, Therapeutic Abortion, Medical, Psychiatric, Anthropological and Legal Considerations (1954).

In all fairness we doubt that the first is the correct understanding of the basis of the "private right of personal freedom" for which the appellants contend. For, were that principle ever to be accepted as the law, there would have crept into the Constitution a potentially terrifying principle that, with very little more logic than the appellants have relied upon to sustain their position in these cases, would equally justify infanticide and euthanasia, at least if the victims were those in a relationship of dependence with the person or persons who wished to destroy them. Nor would the laws which forbid abandonment, failure of support and child neglect be immune from attack.

If the appellants and their supporting amici are maintaining that a woman has a right to the integrity of her body sufficient to permit her alone to decide, for whatever reason, whether to terminate a pregnancy, the proposition cannot prevail.[54] If a woman has sovereignty over her body of the degree suggested by the appellants, how could the States ban prostitution, outlaw suicide or prohibit the use of harmful drugs?

However, in the amicus brief filed by the American Association of University Women and other women's organizations, the "sovereignty of the body" argument is made in a disguised and superficially more plausible form. These amici assert a woman's right of "reproductive autonomy". This they define as the "personal, constitutional right of a woman to determine the number and spacing of her children, and thus to determine whether to bear a particular child . . . ." Such a right, those amici argue, evolves inevitably from the recognition which this Court has afforded to those human interests "which relate to marriage, sex, the family and the raising of children". It is true that the Court has upheld the right of a married couple to plan their offspring prior to contraception, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), a case which, as we show in the next section of this brief, has no applicability to the issues presented in these cases. Parents may have a constitutional right to plan for the number and spacing of children. Still, that right cannot be extended to permit the destruction of a living human being absent a threat to the life of the mother carrying the unborn baby. Family planning, including the contraceptive relationship, is a matter between a man and a woman alone. The abortion relationship, on the other hand, is between the parents and the unborn child. "This additional party changes the whole structure of the situation. The freedom of the parents is limited by the rights of the child." Granfield, The Abortion Decision 184-85 (1969); see also Gleitman v. Cosgrove, supra, at 30-31. Thus, while a man and woman may have the right to plan their family free from interference by the State, which the Court upheld in Griswold, surely such a right cannot be projected, indeed distorted and debased, to serve as justification for the destruction of a third party, the unborn but living child. The right to plan a family no more encompasses the right to intentionally destroy a 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 or 8 month unborn child than it would encompass the right to destroy a one-day-old baby. We do not believe, therefore, that it can successfully be maintained that the Texas and Georgia abortion statutes, and the balancing between any alleged constitutional right to plan a family and the right of an unborn child to life which they attempt to effect, should be struck down as unconstitutional.[55] To reach the contrary result would require this Court's unabashed return to the long-repudiated concept of substantive due process which plagued its decisions for several generations, albeit in another context, i.e., economic and social legislation. The fact that a law might not impress the judiciary as a good law, or might appear to them as futile or unworkable, no longer can serve as a basis for its invalidation.[56] Moreover, even though many doctors, representatives of women's organizations and well known public figures may claim that these abortion statutes are illiberal, outmoded and restrictive of women's rights, this is not the general viewpoint of the American people. A recent careful analysis of abortion and public opinion by demographer Judith Blake indicates that 78% of the population disapproved legalization of abortion when the parents desired no more children.[57] In any event, at this stage of American constitutional development there is no need to remind the Court that the predilections of the populace, much less the individual preferences of judges, cannot serve as a basis to strike down legislation within the competence of the state to enact, especially where the laws so challenged are aimed at protecting the most fundamental of personal liberties protected by the Due Process Clause, i.e., the right not to "be deprived of life".

G. The Right to Life Has Not Been Undermined by Judicial Decision. The amicus has demonstrated the persuasive medical basis supporting the compelling substantial state interests which justify the Texas and Georgia abortion laws. Beyond that, and contrary to the contentions of the appellants and the amici who have filed briefs in their support, nate a pregnancy does not support the proposition in behalf of which it is summoned.

[56]Compare Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), with Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 730 (1963).

[57]Blake, Abortion and Public Opinion: The 1960-1970 Decade, 171 Science 540, 544 (1971). The same study shows that there are wide disparities in American attitudes toward abortions. Women, for example, disapprove of it more than men. Ibid.

NRLC disputes the assertion that a woman enjoys any right of privacy, as yet undefined in American law, which vests in her alone the absolute authority to terminate a pregnancy for any reason whatsoever. No precedents of this Court have gone so far. Nevertheless, the proponents of abortion on demand always advance three or four decisions of the Court from which they argue that the Court has impliedly recognized a startling and dangerous extension of a right of privacy that they now ask the Court to enunciate expressly in the cases at bar. We discuss those alleged analogies in this section of our brief. None of them, we believe, can serve as analogy, much less precedent, for the grave proposition of constitutional law which the appellants seek to establish in this litigation.

A case usually cited by those challenging state abortion laws is Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967). There, this Court held that a state anti-miscegenous marriage statute violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. 388 U.S., at 12. As a supporting ground for its decision, the Court also found that such statutes deny due process, since "the freedom of choice to marry [can] not be restricted by invidious racial discrimination." Ibid. Loving, therefore, is no precedent in support of the appellants' notion of the extreme scope of a woman's constitutional right of privacy. It is purely an invidious racial discrimination holding.

Other cases on which the appellants rely must similarly fail in their role as alleged analogies for their position. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942), decided that the compulsory sterilization of some types of habitual criminals and not others represented an invidious discrimination condemned by the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, Skinner is most accurately read as a case prohibiting the imposition of unreasonable impediments on the right to procreate and, in any event, cannot logically be stretched to serve as an analogy for the unrestricted right to abort. Likewise missing the mark as a supporting precedent is Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925). This was the Court's landmark decision upholding, over the requirements of a state's compulsory school attendance law, the freedom of parents, guaranteed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, "to direct the upbringing and education of [their] children . . . " 268 U.S., at 534. Once more, the liberty which was protected in the Pierce case was not a "right of privacy" and again the legislation which was struck down had "no reasonable relation to some purpose within the competency of the State." 268 U.S., at 535.

When the obviously unanalogous authorities tendered by the appellants are put aside, they are left only with Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), as the one slim reed of alleged precedent to which they cling in arguing for the awesome right of privacy which they would have the Court enunciate in this case. That decision, too, is insufficient to carry such a heavy burden. The Griswold case produced a number of opinions by the Justices of this Court, concurring and dissenting. The actual holding in the case, however, was that a statute which forbade the use of contraceptives by married couples violated a "penumbral" right of marital privacy, older than the Bill of Rights and one falling within a "zone of privacy created by several constitutional guarantees." 381 U.S., at 485. Three of the Justices who decided that case, two dissenting and one concurring, refused to recognize any constitutionally protected right of privacy whatsoever. The remaining six Justices agreed only that a law, the enforcement of which would require the invasion of the marital bedroom, transgressed on the intimacies of, and the right of privacy inherent in, the marital relationship.

The particular aspect of the marital relation with which the Connecticut statute at issue in Griswold interfered was the sexual relationship. The state made it criminal for a married couple to have sexual intercourse using contraceptives. Enforcement of the statute would have required actual invasion of the marital bedchamber. The Connecticut law challenged was more stringent and sweeping than any statute, civil or ecclesiastical, in the history of social efforts to control contraception. Noonan, Contraception 491 (1965). In contrast, the Texas and Georgia statutes do not affect the sexual relations of husband and wife. Pregnancy does not interfere with these relations except under some circumstances at limited times. Guttmacher, Pregnancy and Birth 86 (1960).

Further, it is a distortion of both the "penumbral" and Ninth Amendment approaches relied on by the majority in Griswold to assert them as a basis for challenging state regulation of abortion as unconstitutional. Centuries of judicial and legislative history refute the argument that the unrestricted right to abort is an "emanation" of any specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights necessary to give them "life and substance". 381 U.S., at 484. Where, for example, after considering the "traditions and [collective] conscience of our people", will this Court find the right to unrestricted abortion a principle "so rooted [there] . . . as to be ranked as fundamental"? 381 U.S., at 493 (Goldberg, J. concurring). Rather, in the words of a state court on the subject, the tradition has been that: "Unnecessary interruption of pregnancy is universally regarded as highly offensive to public interest." Miller v. Bennett, 190 Va. 162, 169, 56 S.E.2d 217 (1949).

In relying on the Griswold case, the appellants have not considered that in this case, as opposed to that decision, there is another important interest at stake, the life of an unborn child. If, despite all the medical evidence and legal history on the point, the unborn child is not to be considered a person within contemplation of the law with legally protectable interests, then Griswold possibly might be stretched to serve as a precedent for the result that the appellants urge this Court to reach. On the other hand, if terminating pregnancy is something different from preventing it, if abortion is different from cosmetic surgery, if the fetus is not in the same class as the wart, and if we are dealing with something other than an inhuman organism, then Griswold is totally inapposite. As medical knowledge of prenatal life has expanded, the rights of the unborn child have been enlarged. And even if it could still be argued that the fetus is not fully the equal of the adult, the law, through centuries of judicial decision and legislation, and following the lead supplied by medical science, has raised the equivalency of that life to such a status that the unborn child may not be deprived of it, absent the demonstrated necessity of protecting a reasonably equivalent interest on the part of the mother. Griswold, of course, presented no such conflict and therefore is not controlling in this case.

Finally, as we have previously argued,[58] abortion was always condemned at common law. In Blackstone's words, it was regarded as a "heinous misdemeanor".[59] American law gave it the same hostile reception. Therefore, any argument that by virtue of the passage of the Ninth Amendment there was reserved to pregnant women a "penumbral" constitutional right of privacy entitling her to abort for any reason and that such a "right" was one of the fundamental liberties of American citizens recognized before the Bill of Rights and retained by them thereafter is completely without support in either British or American constitutional history. There was no "right" to abort at common law. Rather, abortion–in contrast to contraception–was considered a serious criminal act.

Thus, on any fair analysis, the appellants' alleged precedents, including Griswold, furnish no support for their claim that there is a constitutional basis on which to claim that a woman has a right to abort, for any reason, an unborn child which she does not want.

III.

THE STATUTES ARE NOT UNCONSTITUTIONALLY VAGUE

In both cases, the appellants attacked the statutes in the courts below on the additional ground that they were unconstitutionally vague. The Texas three-judge federal court agreed. 314 F.Supp., at 1223. The Georgia three-judge court impliedly rejected the argument, but struck the statute down on other constitutional grounds. 319 F.Supp., at 1055. The appellants again raise the vagueness issue in their briefs which they have filed in this Court.

Neither of the courts below had the advantage of this Court's decision in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), at the time they handed down their decisions. In that case, this Court reversed the decision of a district court judge who had found that the District of Columbia abortion law was unconstitutionally vague.[60] The District of Columbia statute outlawed abortions except when "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health."[61] This Court's holding in Vuitch should be dispositive of the vagueness issue in these cases. The exception clause which this Court upheld in Vuitch is no more or less certain of meaning than the exception found in the Texas statute, i.e., "for the purpose of saving the life of the mother". Likewise, the exceptions permitted under the Georgia statute are stated in language free of any inhibiting unconstitutional vagueness or ambiguity.

Doctors are neither in doubt nor in fear as to where abortions permitted by the Texas and Georgia statutes end and where those barred by them begin. For example, a recent study in California, whose abortion statute at the time had an exception limited solely to cases where termination of the pregnancy is necessary to preserve the life of the mother,[62] shows that there has never been a prosecution for an abortion performed in a hospital by a physician licensed to practice medicine in that state. Packer & Gamspell, Therapeutic Abortion, A Problem in Law and Medicine, 11 Stanford L.R. 418, 444 (1959). Other recent studies show the same has been true in New York and in Maryland. Hellegers, Abortion, the Law, and the Common Good, 3 Medical Opinion and Review, No. 5 (May 1967), p. 84. The amicus is confident that the same experience holds for Texas and Georgia and that in those jurisdictions, as in others, "the law has not gone out of its way to make things difficult for the physician, . . ."[63]

The words of Mr. Justice Holmes, as in so many other areas of constitutional law, supply the answer to any claim of the alleged vagueness of these two statutes. Speaking for the Court in United States v. Wurzbach, 280 U.S. 396, 399 (1930), he said:

> "Whenever the law draws a line there will be cases very near each other on opposite sides. The precise course of the line may be uncertain, but no one can come near it without knowing that he does so, if he thinks, and if he does so it is familiar to the criminal law to to make him take the risk."[64]

Accordingly, we urge the Court to adhere to its decision in Vuitch and reject any contention that these two statutes are [63]Hellegers, supra, at 84. Indeed, a recent decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit suggests, should appellants prevail on this appeal, that any "doctor's dilemma" will not be whether he will be punished if he performs an abortion but whether he will be punished if he does not. Mary Doe, et al. v. General Hospital of the District of Columbia, et al., C. A. No. 24,011. For a recent case showing this is not an illusory concern see Gleitman v. Cosgrove, 49 N.J. 22, 227 A.2d 689 (1967).

unconstitutionally vague in prescribing what is criminal conduct on the part of doctors and what is not.

IV.

THE REMAINING CONSTITUTIONAL ARGUMENTS ADVANCED BY THE APPELLANTS AND THE AMICI CURIAE SUPPORTING THEM ARE WITHOUT MERIT

In addition to their primary claim that the Texas and Georgia statutes violate rights of privacy guaranteed by the Ninth and the Fourteenth Amendments, the appellants in these cases, or the amici curiae who filed briefs in support of the appellants, attempt to raise several other constitutional issues. For instance, the doctor-appellants argue that the statutes in question transgress First and Fourteenth Amendment rights which guarantee them the right to pursue their chosen profession. Additionally, the appellants claim that the statutes under challenge in this litigation violate equal protection of the laws, so far as poorer citizens are concerned. These contentions are meritless.

A. The Statutes Do Not Abridge Either First or Fourteenth Amendment Rights of Doctors. In both cases, the doctor-appellants alleged that the particular statute in question "chills and defers plaintiffs from practicing their profession as medical practitioners" and thus offends rights guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.[65] The dispositive answer to these contentions is that neither statute proscribes speech or medical advice but prohibits the commission of the criminal acts specified in the statute. If, as this amicus maintains, the acts outlawed by the statutes are within the constitutional competency of Texas and Georgia to proscribe as criminal conduct, then the argument is closed. Criminal acts do not fall within the "freedom of speech" which the First Amendment protects. Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 498 (1949). On the other hand, if we are wrong and these statutes do represent unconstitutional invasions of a woman's right to privacy, then the free speech argument advanced by the doctor-appellants becomes superfluous. Apart from that, however, we do not believe that the appellants can seriously argue that these abortion statutes are vulnerable on their face as abridging a doctor's or anyone else's right of free expression.

The identical rationale also answers appellants' claims that any freedom to pursue the profession of medicine guaranteed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is offended by the statutes involved in these cases. Cf., e.g., Konigsberg v. State Bar of Calif., 366 U.S. 35, 44 (1961), with Willner v. Committee on Character and Fitness, 373 U.S. 96, 102-03 (1963). And it legitimately could be asked whether the deliberate destruction of the unborn child, absent a threat to a mother's life or a serious menace to her health, is really the practice of the "healing art" of medicine. Frankl, The Doctor and the Soul 37 (1969).

B. Nor Do the Statutes Draw Invidious and Unconstitutional Discriminations Between the More Affluent and the Poor. As so often happens in such cases, the parties attacking abortion statutes argue that they discriminate against the economically deprived. Specifically, appellants contend that there is an advantage to the class which is able to obtain abortions and that this advantage is enjoyed only by the more affluent people of Texas, Georgia and the rest of the United States. We doubt that this contention rises to the level of a constitutional argument which must be dealt with in these cases. If it were necessary, NRLC would point out that the statutes on their face apply to all persons committing the acts condemned and that there is no suggestion that they seek to discriminate on any invidious basis, including that of income.

Of course, departing from the facts of the two cases, it might be argued abstractly that (1) a poor woman finds it more difficult than a rich woman to leave Texas or Georgia in order to get an abortion in a jurisdiction where that might be legal, and (2) she cannot afford treatment by a private physician who, some might say, would be more inclined to find a legal reason for the abortion. Hence, the two statutes bear unequally upon the poor. However, the same theoretical argument could be made of many types of conduct proscribed by the criminal laws of Texas and Georgia. There are jurisdictions to which wealthy persons may travel in order to indulge in the doubtful pleasures of gambling at will, using narcotics without restraint, and enjoying a plurality of wives. Could these doubtful "advantages" on the part of the rich be relied on as any basis to set aside the criminal statutes of Texas or Georgia proscribing such activities within those jurisdictions?

And even if it were assumed to be true that the rich are more likely than the poor to secure the services of a sympathetic physician for purposes of terminating an unwanted pregnancy, such a result, unintended by the statute, would not rise to the level of a constitutional infirmity. "It is no requirement of equal protection that all evils of the same genus be eradicated or none at all." Railway Express Agency v. New York, 336 U.S. 106, 110 (1949). If the statute is to fail, it must be shown that on its face it takes away a right guaranteed to the poor by the Constitution. Fisch v. General Motors Corp., 169 F.2d 266, 270 (C. A. 6, 1948). No such showing is possible in these cases.

Unfortunately, Anatole France's sardonic comment about the "majestic equality" of the law much too often has proved to be true. Many criminal laws in actual practice do bear with unequal severity upon the poor. It is they who are more likely than the rich to be caught, to be unable to post bail bond, to be prosecuted, to be unskillfully defended, to be convicted and to be punished. However, the remedy for these injustices of society lies in the elimination or mitigation of the conditions and causes of poverty and in the reform of the administration of criminal justice, not by the selective invalidation of otherwise lawfully enacted criminal statutes.

V.

APPELLANTS' PUBLIC POLICY ARGUMENTS ARE MISPLACED

In addition to their arguments of unconstitutionality, the appellants, and their supporting amici, dwell at some length on what they believe is the poor public policy inherent in the Texas and Georgia abortion statutes in particular and in abortion laws generally. Attention is called to the fact that the presence of strict abortion statutes requires women often to go to non-medical practitioners for the performance of illegal abortions conducted under poor hygienic conditions. The problem of world overpopulation is also touched upon in the appellants' marshalling of their reasons why they think abortion laws are a bad thing. Finally, in the brief of at least one of the amici, there is the suggestion that abortion laws stand in the way of women's liberation and represent a stamp of servility imposed by men upon the women of America.

In our opinion, the validity of all of these arguments is very questionable. In any case, their assertion, directly or indirectly, in this litigation is misplaced. They should be directed to the legislatures of Texas and Georgia, not to this Court. Moreover, we point out that in recent years it has not been impossible to convince state legislatures that their abortion statutes should be revised.[66] Even if the appellants' public policy arguments were addressed to a legislative body, NRLC would dispute their validity. For example, Sweden, a country not unlike ours, and the nation which has had the longest experience with state-regulated abortions in Western Europe, has produced no evidence that criminal abortions, estimated at 20,000 a year when the law was passed in 1938, have been substantially reduced since that time. Uhrus, [66]New York has enacted an abortion statute which permits abortion for any reason within 24 weeks from the commencement of pregnancy. That act became effective on July 1, 1970. New York Times, July 2, 1970, p. 1. Laws almost, but not quite, as unrestrictive as the New York statute have recently been approved in Alaska, Hawaii and Washington State.

POOR COPY

Some Aspects of the Swedish Law Governing Termination of Pregnancy, the Lancet 1292 (1964). Other studies confirm the belief that liberalization of abortion laws effect no reduction in the rate of criminal abortions and all that is done is to increase the total number of abortions. "Thus it is not unlikely that liberalization may increase rather than decrease maternal mortality." Cavanagh, Reforming the Abortion Laws: A Doctor Looks at the Case, America, April 18, 1970, p. 408.

So far as any alleged problem of overpopulation is concerned, abortion, whether on the free demand of a woman or on the intimidating command of the State, appears as a completely ineffective and extremely dangerous way to deal with such a problem, if it exists.[67] For instance, one side effect of the repeal of abortion statutes and the fostering of abortion through state auspices is that no group will be more likely to feel the sting more bitingly than the mothers of illegitimate children. Already, laws making the birth of illegitimate children a crime suggest the squeeze to which the poor mother might be subjected in an age of unrestricted, and state-sponsored, abortion.[68]

Finally, the suggestion that laws against abortion were enacted by men to constrain the behavior of women has nothing to support it except the historical accident that most of the criminal statutes, including abortion laws, were enacted by male legislators in the 19th Century when women were unable to vote. It is not evident how this general condition of political freedom influenced abortion laws more than it influenced other developments in the criminal law. Moreover, more women than men currently disapprove of elective, or unrestricted, abortion.[69] The suggestion that abortion laws are peculiarly the product of a male-dominated government is especially inapposite in the case of Georgia, which enacted the abortion statute involved in this litigation in 1968. This amicus applauds the continuing process by which illegal discriminations against women have been removed. However, the claim that a woman should be free to destroy a human being whom she has conceived by voluntarily having sexual intercourse can only make sense if that human being be regarded as part of herself, a part which she may discard for her own good. However, at this point, the evolution of social doctrine favoring freedom for women collides squarely with modern scientific knowledge and with the medical and judicial recognition that the fetus in the womb is a living person. A woman should be left free to practice contraception; she should not be left free to commit feticide.

CONCLUSION

NRLC has stated its doubts that the lower courts should have exercised jurisdiction in these cases and urges that the decisions below be vacated on those grounds. However, if the Court does note probable jurisdiction in these two case, we respectfully ask, for the reasons stated in this brief,

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE A BRIEF AS AMICUS CURIAE

Ferdinand Buckley moves the Court for leave to file a brief annexed hereto as Amicus Curiae. Appellees Arthur K. Bolton, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia and Lewis R. Slaton, as District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia, have consented to the filing of the proposed brief. The Appellants, and Herbert T. Jenkins, as Chief of Police of the City of Atlanta, Georgia, have refused to consent to the filing of the attached brief.

By order of Judge Sidney O. Smith, Jr., dated April 25, 1970, Ferdinand Buckley was appointed guardian ad litem of the unborn child of Mary Doe. On May 5, 1970, Judge Smith passed an order revoking the appointment of Ferdinand Buckley as guardian ad litem and granted Ferdinand Buckley leave to participate in the case only as amicus curiae, which he did, filing briefs and taking part in oral argument. Subsequently, Ferdinand Buckley duly filed a motion for reconsideration of said order of May 5, 1970, and also filed a motion for leave to intervene in behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe and on behalf of all unborn children in the State of Georgia who might be affected by a judgment in the action. Both of these motions were overruled in the Court's opinion of July 31, 1970, but were not expressly passed upon in the Court's judgment of August 25, 1970. Ferdinand Buckley therefore filed on September 3, 1970, a motion to alter or amend said judgment of August 25, 1970. By order of October 13, 1970, the Court expressly overruled Ferdinand Buckley's motion for reconsideration of the order of May 5, 1970, revoking his appointment as guardian ad litem and also overruling his motion to intervene in behalf of the unborn child of

After Judge Smith appointed said guardian ad litem of the unborn child of Mary Doe, and before Judge Smith passed his order of May 5, 1970, revoking said appointment, the guardian ad litem filed an answer and counterclaim in behalf of said unborn child. In said counterclaim, the guardian ad litem averred that plaintiffs had conspired to deprive the unborn child of Mary Doe of life in violation of the legal rights of said unborn child secured to him by the United States Constitution, the Georgia Constitution of 1945, and Title 42, Sections 1981, 1985 and 1988 of the United States Code. Said unborn child of Mary Doe prayed for an injunction against plaintiffs depriving him of said rights as provided by Title 42, Section 1983, of the United States Code.

A Notice of Precautionary Appeal from the judgment of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia entered on August 24, 1970, was filed on behalf of said unborn child with the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit on September 18, 1970.

A motion for leave to appeal in forma pauperis was also filed in behalf of the unborn children.

On July 12, 1971, the United States District Court entered an order (Appendix A) refusing to permit the appeal in forma pauperis by Ferdinand Buckley as next friend of the unborn child of Mary Doe and other unborn children in the State of Georgia, but expressly authorizing an appeal in forma pauperis by Ferdinand Buckley in his own name.

Amicus, as next friend of the unborn child of Mary Doe and of all unborn children similarly situated in the State of Georgia, sought to appeal the judgment of the United States District Court to the Supreme Court of the United States. By order dated May 3, 1971, said appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The unborn child of Mary Doe is a "person" and as such is entitled to protection under 42 USCA, §§ 1983 and 1985, as well as under the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution.

The fundamental right to life of the unborn child must be protected against arbitrary extinguishment. For such extinguishment without benefit of his rights being considered is an absolute denial of due process and equal protection of the law.

INTEREST ON AMICUS

The interest of the Amicus is to present certain arguments to this Court with the sole objective of preserving the life of the unborn child of Mary Doe as well as the lives of all other unborn children in the State of Georgia similarly situated.

While it is true that the Attorney General of the State of Georgia has sought to preserve the life of the unborn child of Mary Doe, he has done so only within the context of upholding the constitutionality of the Georgia Abortion Statute now under attack. Also, the primary objective of the remaining appellees, District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia, and the Chief of Police of Atlanta, is merely to demonstrate that neither is now prosecuting or threatening to prosecute Mary Doe or any of the other plaintiffs in the case below for any violation of the Georgia Abortion Statute in question. Most assuredly, Appellants are not interested in preserving the life of said unborn but in fact are dedicated to its destruction.

Therefore, since none of the parties hereto have as their sole objective the preservation of the life of the unborn child of Mary Doe and other unborn children, it becomes of paramount importance for this Court to conside the arguments advanced on behalf of the unborn child by this amicus curiae who has actively participated in every phase of the subject case.

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

The facts of record in this case, the pertinent Georgia statute, and the opinion of the court below are found in the briefs of the parties of record. The District Court's opinion is officially reported at 319 Fed. Sup. 1048 (D.C. N.D. Ga. 1970). This Amicus accepts said statements of fact for purposes of this brief.

INTEREST OF AMICUS AND HIS POSITION IN THE CASE

1. Interest of the Amicus. The Amicus is a member of the Bar of the State of Georgia, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, and of this Court The Amicus was appointed guardian ad litem for the unborn child of Mary Doe by order of the court below of April 25, 1970. That order was revoked by order of the lower court of May 5, 1970, which expressly permitted the Amicus to continue to appear as Amicus Curiae in behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe and other unborn children similarly situated in Georgia in all further proceedings in the court below.

This Amicus feels that as a member of the Bar who has participated and spoken in the proceedings below in behalf of the unborn child of Mary Doe and other unborn children in the State of Georgia similarly situated he has a continuing obligation to assert the rights of unborn children with reference to this appeal.

2. The position of the Amicus on the issues. This Amicus supports the position of appellee Arthur K. Bolton, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia, that the Georgia statute in question is constitutional. However, this Amicus also asserts that an unborn child of a pregnant woman seeking an abortion in the State of Georgia not only has rights which are protected under the statutes and Constitutions of the United States and the State of Georgia, but also has a right to appear as a party by guardian ad litem or next friend in any legal proceeding in which those rights are put in issue.

3. Question presented. This Amicus submits that the determinative question presented by this appeal is whether or not the unborn child of a pregnant woman seeking an abortion in the State of Georgia is, from the moment of conception, a person within the meaning of the United States Constitution and that of the State of Georgia so as to be entitled to enjoy all constitutional rights, privileges and immunities conferred on a person by the United States Constitution and the Constitution of the State of Georgia. This Amicus contends that that question must be answered in the affirmative.

FOR AND ON BEHALF OF ALL PERSONS AND ORGANIZATIONS SIMILARLY SITUATED.

ARGUMENT

The Declaration of Independence provides, inter alia, that ". . . all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness." At what point in time does an unborn child become a human being endowed with fundamental rights which are protected by our Federal and State Constitution? Logically, if men are created equal and are endowed with unalienable rights by their creator, it would seem to follow that they are endowed with these rights at the time of their initial creation.

There is no question that in Georgia a person is endowed with his legal rights from the moment of conception. Both the Georgia Supreme Court and the Georgia legislature have recognized this principal. The Supreme Court of Georgia has stated clearly that the right of a child to be secure in his person commences with his conception. Hornbuckle, b/n/f v. Plantation Pipeline Co., 212 Ga.504, 93 S.E. 2d 727. Cf., Tucker v. Carmichael & Sons, Inc., 208 Ga. 201, 65 S.E.2d 909. The principle of the Hornbuckle case was recognized by the legislature in the provisions of Ga. Code § 26-1202 (c) giving a right of action for declaratory or injunctive relief in behalf of an unborn child.

In order to determine at what point in time an unborn child becomes a "person" entitled to protection under 42 USCA, §§ 1983 and 1985, as well as under the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments of the United States Constitution, the Federal Court should look to Georgia law. Brazier v. Cherry, 293 F.2d 401 (USCA 5th, 1961). In this regard, Georgia law is clear. The unborn child's rights begin at conception.

There is no basis in logic or justice either to an unborn child or to society-at-large for the law to protect the property of an unborn child, but to refuse to protect the very person of such unborn. Tucker v. Carmichael & Sons, Inc., supra. Moreover, the vast majority of courts which have passed upon the question within the last twenty years have recognized the right of an unborn child to be secure in its person, at least from the time it is "quick". See "Prenatal Injury As Ground Of Action," 27 A.L.R. 2d 1256, and "Action For Death Of Unborn Child," 15 A.L.R. 3d 992.

It has been held in Georgia that the negligence of a mother of an unborn child could not be imputed to the unborn child so as to affect the right of such child to recover damages for injuries inflicted upon him by a negligent third party. Fallaw v. Hobbs, 113 Ga. App. 181, 147 S.E.2d 517. It follows that this recognition by the Georgia Court of Appeals of the fact that an unborn child is a person with legal rights separate and distinct from those of his mother is based on the premise that the rights of the mother are not paramount but must be considered in conjunction with the right of the unborn child to life. Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Mem. Hosp. v. Anderson, 201 A. 2d 537 (1964).

The law of Georgia manifests a particular concern for children, born and unborn. For example, Ga. Code § 74-9903 prohibits the abandonment of an unborn child, and Ga. Code § 74-105 prohibits the abandonment of the child after birth. Also, Ga. Code § 74-111 requires every physician in this State who has reason to believe that physical injury was inflicted upon a child by a parent to make a report of such findings. See also Ga. Code § 74-109 permitting the Ordinary to appoint a guardian for a child who is subject to cruel treatment by his parents; Ga. Code § 26-2801 making it a crime for one who has custody of a child under the age of eighteen years of age to deprive him of necessary sustenance or to maliciously cause the child excessive physical or mental pain; Ga. Code § 88-1716 requiring a registration of all fetal deaths.

In seeking to balance the conflicting interests of mother and child, the Supreme Court of New Jersey in the case of Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Mem. Hosp. vs. Anderson, supra, was concerned with an action by a hospital seeking authority to administer blood transfusions to a pregnant woman who did not wish to have same for the reason that they were contrary to her religious conviction as a Jehovah's Witness. The Court stated, at page 438:

> "We are satisfied that the unborn child is entitled to the law's protection and that an appropriate order should be made to insure blood transfusions to the mother in the event they are necessary in the opinion of the physician in charge at the time."

The United States Supreme Court denied certiorari in 377 U.S. 985 (1964).

Similarly, in Wagner vs. Finch, 413 F.2d 267 (CA 5th) (1969), it was held that the illegitimate child of a deceased father, conceived before, but born after, the father's death, was sufficiently in being to be capable of living with the father at the time of his death so as to qualify said child for benefits under the Social Security Act. Thus, the unborn child was "in being" so as to be entitled to the law's protection.

Thus, we see that the child in his mother's womb has legal rights which are entitled to protection in the State of Georgia as well as in most, if not all, of the states of this country. And, as already seen, the unborn child is a "person" for many legal purposes, and the Fourteenth Amendment expressly provides that no state shall "deprive any person of life . . . without due process of law."

In this case the appellants assert various assorted alleged rights of privacy as a basis for their attack upon the constitutionality of the Georgia statute under consideration. Opposed to those alleged rights is the unborn child's fundamental right to life itself.

In Price vs. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 64 S. Ct. 784 (1944), this Court recognized that a State may act as parens patriae in behalf of a child to protect the child from his own parent. The Court stated, at 321 U.S. 166:

> "It is cardinal with us that the custody, care and nurture of the child reside first in the parents, whose primary function and freedom include preparation for obligations the State can neither supply nor hinder . . . and it is in recognition of this that these decisions have respected the private realm of family life which the State cannot enter. But the family itself is not beyond regulation in the public interest, as against a claim of > religious liberty. (Citation omitted). And neither rights of religion nor rights of parenthood are beyond limitation. Acting to guard the general interests in youth's well-being, the State as parens patriae may restrict the parents' control by requiring school attendance, regulating or prohibiting the child's labor, and in many other ways. Its authority is not nullified merely because a parent grounds his claim to control the child's course of conduct on religion or conscience. Thus, he cannot claim freedom from compulsory vaccination for the child more than for himself on religious grounds. The right to practice religion freely does not include liberty to expose the community or the child to communicable disease or the latter to ill health or death."

. While the Constitution prohibits the deprivation of liberty without due process of law, "The Constitution does not recognize an absolute and uncontrollable liberty. Liberty in each of its phases has a history and connotation. But the liberty safeguarded is a liberty in a social organization which requires the protection of law against the evils which meance the health, safety, morals, and welfare of the people. Liberty under the Constitution is thus necessarily subject to the restraints of due process, and regulation which is reasonable in relation to its subject and is adopted in the interests of the community is due process." Wesco Hotel Co. vs. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 391 (1937). See also Zemel vs. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1, 14 (1965); Edwards vs. People of State of Calif., 314

> "The basic problem is not whether a court in exercising the power of judicial review may pass judgment on legislative acts, but rather how wisely it exercises this power in identifying, appraising and weighin the competing interests.", Prof. Paul G. Kauper: "Penumbras, Peripheries, Emanations, Things Fundamental and Things Forgotten: The Griswold case", 64 Mich. Law Review 235, 257, 258.

In "A Survey of Social Interests," 57 Harvard Law Review 1 (1943), Dean Roscoe Pound stated much the same proposition thusly:

> "Looked at functionally, the law is an attempt to satisfy, to reconcile, to harmonize, to adjust these overlapping and often conflicting claims and demands either through securing them directly and immediately, or through securing certain individual interests, or through delimitations or compromises of individual interest, so as to give effect to the greatest total interests or to the interests that weigh most in our civilization, with the least sacrifice of the scheme of interests as a whole."

So we see that the General Assembly of Georgia was confronted with the various conflicting interests which surround and are intertwined with the interests on the one hand of the pregnant woman and her health and self preservation of the life of the unborn child. The General Assembly provided certain circumstances under which an abortion might be performed, and prohibited all other abortions. The General Assembly further provided that any Solicitor General (now District Attorney) in a Judicial Circuit in which an abortion is to be performed under the Georgia Abortion Act, or any person who would be a relative of the child within the second degree of consanguinity, may petition the Superior Court of the county in which the abortion is to be performed for a declaratory judgment as to whether the performance of such an abortion would violate any constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus. The General Assembly further provided that if the Court determined that such an abortion would violate the constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus, the Court should so declare and should restrain the physician from performing the abortion. The General Assembly of Georgia did that which it was required to do; it provided a procedure for raising and asserting the constitutional rights of the unborn child.

The appellees have vigorously sought to uphold the constitutionality of the Georgia statute. However, without in any way diminishing the splendid efforts of the appellees, we believe that it is only fair to state that the primary objective of the appellees is to uphold the constitutionality of the Georgia abortion statute and to assert that the appellees in their respective official capacities are violating no constitutional rights of the appellants.

On the other hand, the sole objective of this Amicus is to preserve the life of the unborn child of Mary Doe and the lives of other unborn children in the State of Georgia similarly situated, whether or not the Georgia abortion statute in question can meet constitutional requirements.

Speaking of the Fourteenth Amendment, Mr. Justice Thurgood Marshall once said:

> "This self-executing language is, however, deceiving. Its positive form does not guarantee automatic enforcement. The courts, naturally enough, exercise the power in cases brought before them to decree when the rights guaranteed by the amendment have been infringed. But these rights cannot be enforced unless those who possess them know they exist and are given the legal means to vindicate them. Without the commitment of the bar, those protected by the amendment will ordinarily possess neither the knowledge nor the skills needed to make the promises of the amendment meaningful. Without the commitment of large numbers of lawyers, of 'private attorneys-general' if you will the amendment will mean nothing.
> "Ironically enough, this basic point about the role of the judiciary was made pointedly by one of the Justices concurring in the Dred Scott decision, the decision reversed by the combined force of a civil war and the fourteenth amendment itself. In deciding Dred Scott, Mr. Justice Wayne declared: '[T]he court neither sought nor made the case.' And so today, under far different concepts of right and justice, the courts still cannot 'make' cases. They must be brought by litigants, well-informed of their rights, through lawyers dedicated to the principles which lie behind that great amendment." 3 Ga. Law Review 1, 3 (1968).

"Today, the legislatures, the courts the bar, and the people of this country are demonstrating a concern for fairness and justice unparalleled in the history of our nation. Can we say that the fight has been won? Can we rest upon our past accomplishments? If we do, we have not learned well the lessons of the past one hundred years. We have not learned that constant vigilance is necessary to maintain justice and freedom. We have not learned that solemn declarations and victories have a way of fading in the face of other national concerns. We have not learned that inequality and injustice are complex, pervading cancers. The framers of the fourteenth amendment thought a solemn declaration would forever solve the problem of social injustice. As they were wrong, we would be wrong in assuming that the victories of the last decade will establish and maintain that goal. Vigilance is necessary to prevent backsliding. But more important are the goals of the future. They are many and diverse--they are familiar to you--meaningful compliance with the legacy of Brown, effective counsel and defense for the criminally accused, and perhaps most important, the need for 'legal power' on the side of the socially and economically depressed. These are your goals. It is your job as future lawyers, future judges, future legislators, and as legal educators to see that the nation's concerns for justice through law does not again go the way of the fourteenth amendment. For if you do not seek these goals, the nation that depends upon you for leadership will soon forget the lessons of the past one hundred years. Elihu Root spoke to the point in 1904. His words still hold true: 'The lawyer's profession demands of him something more than the ordinary public service of citizenship. He has a duty to the law. In the cause of peace and order and human rights against all injustice and wrong, he is the advocate of all men, present and to come.'" Id. at 9, 10.

CONCLUSION

This Court should recognize the fundamental right of the unborn child to life, and the responsibility of the State to protect the life of the unborn child. It is this fundamental right to life of the unborn child of Mary Doe and of all unborn children similarly situated which should be recognized and protected by this Court. This Court should further recognize that the unborn child has a right to be heard through a guardian ad litem or next friend in any action in which his right to life is in issue.

We therefore respectfully submit that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the court below should be instructed to enter an order dismissing the plaintiffs' complaint.

Respectfully submitted.

APPENDIX A

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA
ATLANTA DIVISION

MARY DOE, et al.,	:
Plaintiff	:
	:	CIVIL ACTION
vs.	:
ARTHUR K. BOLTON, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia LEWIS R. SLATON, as District Attorney of Fulton County, Georgia, and HERBERT T. JENKINS, as Chief of Police of the City of Atlanta,	:	NUMBER 13676
Defendants	:

In this case, Ferdinand Buckley was originally appointed as guardian ad litem for the unborn child of Mary Doe. Upon consideration by the court, the order of appointment was revoked. A motion was made to reconsider and/or to intervene on behalf of all unborn children who might be affected by the order, which was likewise denied. However, Mr. Buckley was invited and allowed to participate in the case as amicus curiae.

In the instant motion, Mr. Buckley seeks to appeal the court's orders denying his right to proceed as guardian ad litem or as intervener. In the present motion, he characterizes himself as "next friend" and "attorney of record" of the affected class. It is, of course, the court's desire that he be allowed to appeal the court's previous orders and, under the circumstances, it is appropriate that it be done in forma pauperis. However, by such order, the court does not designate Mr. Buckley as "next friend" for the class or as "attorney of record" for such class nor confer any standing upon Mr. Buckley to represent the class, as such act would be inconsistent with the previous orders of the court.

Accordingly, the motion for leave to appeal in forma pauperis is granted to Mr. Ferdinand Buckley. Otherwise it is denied.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

This the 12th day of July, 1971.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

No. 70-40

MARY DOE, ET AL.,

Appellants,

vs.

ARTHUR K. BOLTON, ET AL.,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE.

PURPOSE OF THE MOTION.

All parties in No. 70-18 (the Texas case) have given their written consent to Dr. Bart Heffernan, one of the amici herein, to file an amicus curiae brief.[1] The appellants in No. 70-40 (the Georgia case) have never responded to a request for consent. The appellees do not object to these amici filing in this cause.[2]

INTEREST OF THE AMICI.

1. Identification of the amici. Dr. Bart Heffernan has an appeal presently pending before this Court in the case of Heffernan, et al. v. Doe, et al., docketed as No. 70-106, October 1971 term, which case involves the constitutionality of the Illinois criminal abortion statute, and is similar to both Jane Roe, et al. v. Wade, No. 70-18, and Mary Doe, et al. v. Bolton, No. 70-40. The Jurisdictional Statement in the Heffernan case was filed on March 29, 1971, but no action was taken thereon during the last term of Court.

Any ruling on the merits in the Georgia and Texas cases could profoundly and perhaps adversely affect the outcome of the Illinois case, in which case Dr. Heffernan was appointed guardian ad litem for the class of unborn children. He asks leave of this Court to file this amicus curiae brief on behalf of his wards.

The other amici are physicians, professors and certain Fellows of the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology who seek to place before this Court the scientific evidence of the humanity of the unborn so that the Court may know and understand that the unborn are developing

1. Written consents have been filed with the clerk of this court.

2. Response of appellees has been filed with the clerk of this court.

human persons who need the protection of law just as do adults.

These amici also desire to bring to the Court's attention the medical complications of induced abortion, both in terms of maternal morbidity and mortality (as well as the mortality to the child), and to show that these are questions of considerable debate in medicine.

2. The Legal Position of these Amici in these cases. The unborn child is a developing human being who is entitled to the law's protection just as is an adult.

3. Justification for Participation as Amici. As previously stated, the issues in these cases, as well as the pending case of Heffernan v. Doe, No. 70-106, October 1971 term, are of the most profound significance dealing with the most basic and fundamental of human rights: The Right to Life.

In reviewing the Briefs filed in both cases it appears that no attempt was made to advise the Court of the scientific facts of life from conception to birth, or of the medical complications of induced abortion, and it is urged that presentation of this information is a reasonable justification for participation by these amici.

CONCLUSION.

For the reasons stated and for additional reasons as contained in and expanded upon in the Brief itself, these amici respectfully request this Court to grant this Motion and grant leave for filing this Brief served herewith.

Respectfully submitted,

Appellees.

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE OF CERTAIN PHYSICIANS, PROFESSORS AND FELLOWS OF THE AMERICAN COLLEGE OF OBSTETRICS AND GYNECOLOGY IN SUPPORT OF APPELLEES.

I.

THE HUMANITY OF THE UNBORN OFFSPRING OF HUMAN PARENTS HAS BEEN THE CRITICAL ISSUE IN LOWER FEDERAL COURT ABORTION CASES.

The immediate and intended consequence of an induced abortion is the destruction of life of the unborn. It is in the light of this reality that this Court must consider and decide the profound and far-reaching issues in these abortion cases.

The amici are concerned physicians, many of whom are fellows of the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology (FACOG), who urge this Court to consider the current medical and scientific evidence of the humanity of the unborn which is contained in this Brief.

The amici also urge this Court to give careful consideration to the section of this Brief concerning the medical complications of legally induced abortions. Any consideration of the "safety" of legally induced abortions must consider the full range of medical complications including early and late physical and psychological complications, as well as maternal and child mortality.

The Courts below reached their conclusions without considering whether the victim, i.e. the unborn, of the abortion has constitutionally protected rights. In Roe v. Wade,[1] the U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Texas, without once mentioning, discussing or considering whether the unborn is a "person" under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, or otherwise has legally protected interests involved, concluded that the "Texas Abortion Laws must be declared unconstitutional because they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children."

1. Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217 (1970) at 1221 (N. D. Tex. 1970).

In Doe v. Bolton,[2] the U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia touched, but only in passing, upon the primary issue in this litigation, i.e. the legal "personality" of the unborn for constitutional purposes. At one point in the opinion, the Court wrote that it did not ". . . (posit) the existence of a new being with its own identity and federal constitutional rights, . . ."[3] Elsewhere in the opinion the Court, in denying a reconsideration of the Court's previous order revoking another's appointment as guardian ad litem for the unborn person, wrote that ". . . the Court does not postulate the existence of a new being with federal constitutional rights at any time during gestation".

The Bolton Court was thus able to conclude that, while procedures for obtaining an abortion may be controlled, the "reasons for which an abortion may be obtained" may not be regulated "because such action unduly restricts a decision sheltered by the constitutional right to privacy".[4]

The Bolton Court did point out that once conception has occurred and the embryo has formed, ". . . the decision to abort its development cannot be considered a purely private one affecting only husband and wife, man and woman".[5]

Other three-judge federal courts presented with the same clash of "rights" between mother and the unborn have not ignored the developments of many areas of the law which have found legal rights in the unborn. For example, in Steinberg v. Brown[6] the majority gave careful consideration to both the rights of the woman and the unborn, and concluded that ". . . the state has a legitimate interest to legislate for the purpose of affording an embryonic or fetal organism an opportunity to survive."[7] This Court concluded that the state did have that right ". . . and on balance it is superior to the claimed right of a pregnant woman or anyone else to destroy the fetus except when necessary to preserve her own life."[8]

In Rosen v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners[9] the Court recognized that it was not dealing merely with the question whether a woman has a generalized right to choose whether to bear children ". . . but instead with the more complicated question whether a pregnant woman has the right to cause the abortion of the embryo or fetus she carries in her womb."[10] Without deciding whether the unborn per se is a person protected by the constitution since that was not the issue that Court faced, the Rosen Court concluded that the state of Louisiana had intended to and could legitimately protect fetal life against destruction.[11]

In Corkey v. Edwards[12] the Court concluded also that the issue involved ultimately a consideration of more than just the issue of whether a woman has a right not to bear children:

> "The basic distinction between a decision whether to bear children which is made before conception and one which is made after conception is that the first contemplates the creation of a new human organism, but the latter contemplates the destruction of such an organism already created."[13]

Finding protection of fetal life an adequate state interest in invading the woman's claimed right of privacy, the Corkey Court concluded:

> "To determine the state interest we shall not attempt to choose between extreme positions. Whether possessing a soul from the moment of conception or mere protoplasm, the fertilized egg is, we think, 'unique as a physical entity', Lucas, Federal Constitutional Limitations of the Enforcement and Administration of State Abortion Statutes, 46 N. C. L. Rev. 730, 744 (1968), with the potential to become a person. Whatever that entity is, the state has chosen to protect its very existence. The state's power to protect children is a well established constitutional maxim. See, Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 485, 81 S. Ct. 247, 5 L. Ed. 2d 231 (1960); Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U. S. 158, at 166-168, 64 S. Ct. 438, 88 L. Ed. 645. That this power should be used to protect a fertilized egg or embryo or fetus during the period of gestation embodies no logical infirmity, but would seemingly fall within the 'plenary power of government'. Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497, at 539, 81 S. Ct. 1752, 6 L. Ed. 2d 989 (Harlan, J., dissenting). That there is a state interest has until recently been taken for granted. History sides with the state." [14]

Even this brief review of five federal decisions involving the constitutionality of state abortion laws makes it clear that whether or not the Court considers the developing humanity of the unborn is critical in its resolution of the issues.[15]

The amici therefore ask this Court to consider the material in this Brief concerning the modern medical discoveries of the development of the unborn.

14. Ibid. p. 1253.

15. Even the Bolton Court preserved the Georgia statute after alluding in its decision to the creation of a new life after conception, thus making any decision involving abortion one affecting the state since it involved developing human life.

An expansion of the right to privacy to include the right of a woman to have an abortion without considering the interests of the unborn person decides this question against the unborn. The necessary consequence of that expansion would be a direct and unavoidable conflict between the unborn person's right to life and the woman's extended right of privacy. Assuming such a conflict, it is the position of the amici that the more fundamental and established of the conflicting rights must prevail where they clash. The right to life is most certainly the most fundamental and established of the rights involved in the cases facing the Court today.

II.

THE UNBORN OFFSPRING OF HUMAN PARENTS IS AN AUTONOMOUS HUMAN BEING.*

Even before implantation in the wall of the uterus the unborn child is responsible for the maintenance of the pregnant state in the maternal metabolism (1). The child whose tissue is antigenically different from the mother sets up protective mechanisms to prevent maternal immunologic responses from causing fetal distress (2). The newly formed child has a remarkable degree of metabolic autonomy (3). For example, the fetal endocrine system functions autonomously (4).

The recent recognition of this autonomy has led to the development of new medical specialties concerning the unborn child from the earliest stages of the pregnancy (56).

Modern obstetrics has discarded as unscientific the concept that the child in the womb is but tissue of the mother. As Dr. H. M. I. Liley, the New Zealand pediatrician, and research assistant to her famous husband, Dr. Albert Liley who perfected the intrauterine transfusion, has said:

> "Another medical fallacy that modern obstetrics discards is the idea that the pregnant woman can be treated as a patient alone. No problem in fetal health or disease can any longer be considered in isolation. At the very least two people are involved, the mother and her child." (5 at p. 207.)

The courts have also abandoned that concept (7):

> "We ought to be safe in this respect in saying that legal separability should begin where there is biological separability. We know something more of the actual process of conception and foetal development now than when some of the common law cases were decided; and what we know makes it possible to demonstrate clearly that separability begins at conception.
> The mother's biological contribution from conception on is nourishment and protection; but the foetus has become a separate organism and remains so throughout its life. That it may not live if its protection and nourishment are cut off earlier than the viable stage of its development is not to destroy its separability; it is rather to describe the conditions under which life will not continue."

Yet the attack on the statutes below assume this discredited scientific concept and argues that abortions should be considered no differently than any medical measure taken to protect maternal health (see Texas appellant's brief, pp. 94-98), thus completely ignoring the developing human being in the mother's womb.

It is our task in the next subsections to show how clearly and conclusively modern science—embryology, fetology, genetics, perinatology, all of biology—establishes the humanity of the unborn child. We submit that the data not only shows the constitutionality of the legislature's effort to save the unborn from indiscriminate extermination, but in fact suggests a duty to do so. We submit also that no physician who understands this will argue that the law is vague, uncertain or overbroad for he will understand that the law calls upon him to exercise his art for the benefit of his two patients: mother and child.

A. The Unborn Person Is Also a Patient.

From conception the child is a complex, dynamic, rapidly growing organism. By a natural and continuous process the single fertilized ovum will, over approximately nine months, develop into the trillions of cells of the newborn. The natural end of the sperm and ovum is death unless fertilization occurs. At fertilization a new and unique being is created which, although receiving one-half of its chromosomes from each parent, is really unlike either (8) (6) (9) (10 at p. 18).

About seven to nine days after conception, when there are already several hundred cells of the new individual formed, contact with the uterus is made and implantation begins. Blood cells begin at 17 days and a heart as early as 18 days. This embryonic heart which begins as a simple tube starts irregular pulsations at 24 days, which, in about one week, smooth into a rhythmic contraction and expansion (8) (9) (10) (6).

Straus, et al. have shown that the ECG on a 23 mm embryo (7.5 weeks) presents the existence of a functionally complete cardiac system and the possible existence of a Myoneural or humoral regulatory mechanism. All the classic elements of the adult ECG were seen (11). Marcel and Exchaquet observed occasional contractions of the heart in a 6 mm (2 week) embryo. They also obtained tracings exhibiting the classical elements of the ECG tracing of an adult in a 15 mm embryo (5 weeks) (12).

One commentator has indicated that about 4 days post-conception under a special microscope the prospective sex can already be determined (10 at p. 23).

Commencing at 18 days the developmental emphasis is on the nervous system even though other vital organs, such as the heart, are commencing development at the same time. Such early development is necessary since the nervous system integrates the action of all other systems. By the end of the 20th day the foundation of the child's brain, spinal cord and entire nervous system will have been established. By the 6th week after conception this system will have developed so well that it is controlling movements of the baby's muscles, even though the woman may not be aware that she is pregnant. By the 33rd day the cerebral cortex, that part of the central nervous system that governs motor activity as well as intellect may be seen (8) (13) (10).

The baby's eyes begin to form at 19 days. By the end of the first month the foundation of the brain, spinal cord, nerves and sense organs is completely formed. By 28 days the embryo has the building blocks for 40 pairs of muscles situated from the base of its skull to the lower end of its spinal column. By the end of the first month the child has completed the period of relatively greatest size increase and the greatest physical change of a lifetime. He or she is ten thousand times larger than the fertilized egg and will increase its weight six billion times by birth, having in only the first month gone from the one cell state to millions of cells (8) (9) (10) (6) (13). [See Fig. 1.]

> "This, then, is the great planning period, when out of apparently nothing comes evidence of a well integrated individual, who will form along certain well-tried patterns, but who will, in the end, be distinguishable from every other human being by virtue of ultra microscopic chromosomal differences." (10 at p. 35.)

By the beginning of the second month the unborn child, small as it is, looks distinctly human. (See Fig. 1.) Yet, by this time the child's mother is not even aware that she is pregnant (6).

As Shettles and Rugh state:

> "And as for the question, 'when does the embryo become human?' the answer is that it always had human potential, and no other, from the instant the sperm and the egg came together because of its chromosomes." (Emphasis in original.) (10 at p. 40.)

At the end of the first month the child is about ¼ of an inch in length. At 30 days the primary brain is present and the eyes, ears and nasal organs have started to form. Although the heart is still incomplete, it is beating regularly and pumping blood cells through a closed vascular system (8). The child and mother do not exchange blood, the child having from a very early point in its development its own and complete vascular system (8) (9) (10) (12) (13).

Earliest reflexes begin as early as the 42nd day. The male penis begins to form. The child is almost ½ inch long and cartilage has begun to develop (8) (9). [See Fig. 2.]

Even at 5½ weeks the fetal heartbeat is essentially similar to that of an adult in general configuration (12) (13). The energy output is about 20% that of the adult, but the fetal heart is functionally complete and normal by 7 weeks (12) (13). Shettles and Rugh describe the child at this point of its development as a 1-inch miniature doll with a large head, but gracefully formed arms and legs and an unmistakably human face (10 at p. 54). [See Fig. 2]

By the end of the seventh week we see a well proportioned small scale baby. In its seventh week, it bears the familiar external features and all the internal organs of the adult, even though it is less than an inch long and weighs only 1/30th of an ounce. The body has become nicely rounded, padded with muscles and covered by a thin skin. The arms are only as long as printed exclamation marks, and have hands with fingers and thumbs. The slower growing legs have recognizable knees, ankles and toes (8) (9) (10) (6). [See Figs. 3 and 4]

The new body not only exists, it also functions. The brain in configuration is already like the adult brain and sends out impulses that coordinate the function of the other organs. The brain waves have been noted at 43 days [14]. The heart beats sturdily. The stomach produces digestive juices. The liver manufactures blood cells and the kidneys begin to function by extracting uric acid from the child's blood (13) (49). The muscles of the arms and body can already be set in motion (15).

After the eighth week no further primordia will form; everything is already present that will be found in the full term baby (10 at p. 71). As one author describes this period:

> "A human face with eyelids half closed as they are in someone who is about to fall asleep. Hands that soon will begin to grip, feet trying their first gentle kicks." (10 at p. 71)

From this point until adulthood, when full growth is achieved somewhere between 25 and 27 years, the changes in the body will be mainly in dimension and in gradual refinement of the working parts (8) (46).

The development of the child, while very rapid, is also very specific. The genetic pattern set down in the first day of life instructs the development of a specific anatomy. The ears are formed by seven weeks and are specific, and may resemble a family pattern (16). The lines in the hands start to be engraved by eight weeks and remain a distinctive feature of the individual (45) (49). [See Fig. 3]

The primitive skeletal system has completely developed by the end of six weeks (8) (9). This marks the end of the child's embryonic (from Greek, to swell or teem within) period. From this point, the child will be called a fetus (Latin, young one or offspring) (9). [See Fig. 2]

In the third month, the child becomes very active. By the end of the month he can kick his legs, turn his feet, curl and fan his toes, make a fist, move his thumb, bend his wrist, turn his head, squint, frown, open his mouth, press his lips tightly together (15). He can swallow and drinks the amniotic fluid that surrounds him. Thumb sucking is first noted at this age. The first respiratory motions move fluid in and out of his lungs with inhaling and exhaling respiratory movements (13) (15). [See Fig. 5]

The movement of the child has been recorded at this early stage by placing delicate shock recording devices on the mother's abdomen and direct observations have been made by the famous embryologist, Davenport Hooker, M.D. Over the last thirty years, Dr. Hooker has recorded the movement of the child on film, some as early as six weeks of age. His films show that prenatal behavior develops in an orderly progression (15) (17) (18).

The prerequisites for motion are muscles and nerves. In the sixth to seventh weeks, nerves and muscles work together for the first time (8). If the area of the lips, the first to become sensitive to touch, is gently stroked, the child responds by bending the upper body to one side and making a quick backward motion with his arms. This is called a total pattern response because it involves most of the body, rather than a local part. Localized and more appropriate reactions such as swallowing follow in the third month. By the beginning of the ninth week, the baby moves spontaneously without being touched. Sometimes his whole body swings back and forth for a few moments. By eight and a half weeks the eyelids and the palms of the hands become sensitive to touch. If the eyelid is stroked, the child squints. On stroking the palm, the fingers close into a small fist (17) (15) (13) (64).

In the ninth and tenth weeks, the child's activity leaps ahead. Now if the forehead is touched, he may turn his head away and pucker up his brow and frown. He now has full use of his arms and can bend the elbow and wrist independently. In the same week, the entire body becomes sensitive to touch (7) (15). [See Fig. 6]

The twelfth week brings a whole new range of responses. The baby can now move his thumb in opposition to his fingers. He now swallows regularly. He can pull up his upper lip; the initial step in the development of the sucking reflex (5). By the end of the twelfth week, the quality of muscular response is altered. It is no longer marionette-like or mechanical—the movements are now graceful and fluid, as they are in the newborn. The child is active and the reflexes are becoming more vigorous. All this is before the mother feels any movement (5) (64). [See Figs. 5 and 7]

The phenomenon of "quickening" reflects maternal sensitivity and not fetal competence.* Dr. Hooker states that fetal activity occurs at a very early age normally in utero and some women may feel it as early as thirteen weeks.

*If the Court is interested in the actual medical history of nineteenth century legislative opposition to abortion, it may consult the American Medical Association, 1846-1952 Digest of Official Actions (edited F. J. L. Blasingame 1959), p. 66, where a list of the repeated American Medical Association attacks on abortion are compiled. It will be seen that the great medical battle of the nineteenth century was to persuade legislatures to eliminate the requirement of quickening and to condemn abortion from conception, see Isaac M. Quimby Introduction to Medical Jurisprudence, Journal of American Medical Association, August 6, 1887, Vol. 9, p. 164 and H. C. Markham Foeticide and Its Prevention, ibid, Dec. 8, 1888, Vol. 11, p. 805. It will be seen that the Association unanimously condemned abortion as the destruction of "human life" American Medical Association, Minutes of the Annual Meeting 1859, The American Medical Gazette 1859, Vol. 10, p. 409.

Fig. 6—10 weeks.

Others feel very little as late as twenty weeks and some are always anxious because they do not perceive movement (17).

Dr. Liley states:

> "Historically 'quickening' was supposed to delineate the time when the fetus became an independent human being possessed of a soul. Now, however, we know that while he may have been too small to make his motions felt, the unborn baby is active and independent long before his mother feels him. Quickening is a maternal sensitivity and depends on the mother's own fat, the position of the placenta and the size and strength of the unborn child." (5 at pp. 37, 38)

Every child shows a distinct individuality in his behavior by the end of the third month. This is because the actual structure of the muscles varies from baby to baby. The alignment of the muscles of the face, for example, follow an inherited pattern. The facial expressions of the baby in his third month are already similar to the facial expression of his parents (13) (14) (49). [See Figs. 5 and 7]

Dr. Arnold Gesell states that: "By the end of the first trimester (12th week) the fetus is a sentient moving being. We need not pause to speculate as to the nature of his psychic attributes but we may assert that the organization of his psychosomatic self is now well under way." (49 at p. 65)

Further refinements are noted in the third month. The fingernails appear. The child's face becomes much prettier. His eyes, previously far apart, now move closer together. The eyelids close over the eyes. Sexual differentiation is apparent in both internal and external sex organs, and primitive eggs and sperm are formed. The vocal cords are completed. In the absence of air they cannot produce sound; the child cannot cry aloud until birth, although he is capable of crying long before (8) (13) (9) (5).

Dr. Liley relates the experience of a doctor who injected an air bubble into an unborn baby's (eight months) amniotic sac in an attempt to locate the placenta on x-ray. It so happened that the air bubble covered the unborn baby's face. The moment the unborn child had air to inhale, his vocal cords became operative and his crying became audible to all present, including the physician and technical help. The mother telephoned the doctor later to report that whenever she lay down to sleep, the air bubble got over the unborn baby's face and he was crying so loudly he was keeping both her and her husband awake (5 at p. 50) (15 at p. 75).

The taste buds and salivary glands develop in this month, as do the digestive glands in the stomach. When the baby swallows amniotic fluid, its contents are utilized by the child. The child starts to urinate (8) (13) (19).

From the twelfth to the sixteenth week, the child grows very rapidly (50). His weight increases six times, and he grows to eight to ten inches in height. For this incredible growth spurt the child needs oxygen and food. This he receives from his mother through the placental attachment —much like he receives food from her after he is born. His dependence does not end with expulsion into the external environment (8) (9) (13) (6) (10). We now know that the placenta belongs to the baby, not the mother, as was long thought (5). [See Fig. 8]

In the fifth month, the baby gains two inches in height and ten ounces in weight. By the end of the month he will be about one foot tall and will weigh one pound. Fine baby hair begins to grow on his eyebrows and on his head and a fringe of eyelashes appear. Most of the skeleton hardens. The baby's muscles become much stronger, and as the child becomes larger his mother finally perceives his many activities (8). The child's mother comes to recognize the movement and can feel the baby's head, arms and legs.

Fig. 8—16 weeks.

She may even perceive a rhythmic jolting movement —fifteen to thirty per minute. This is due to the child hiccoughing (13) (5) (6). The doctor can already hear the heartbeat with his stethoscope (8) (13) (6). [See Figs. 9 and 10]

The baby sleeps and wakes just as it will after birth (63) (5). When he sleeps he invariably settles into his favorite position called his "lie". Each baby has a characteristic lie (5). When he awakens he moves about freely in the buoyant fluid turning from side to side, and frequently head over heel. Sometimes his head will be up and sometimes it will be down. He may sometimes be aroused from sleep by external vibrations. He may wake up from a loud tap on the tub when his mother is taking a bath. A loud concert or the vibrations of a washing machine may also stir him into activity (13). The child hears and recognizes his mother's voice before birth (19) (20). Movements of the mother, whether locomotive, cardiac or respiratory, are communicated to the child (19).

In the sixth month, the baby will grow about two more inches, to become fourteen inches tall. He will also begin to accumulate a little fat under his skin and will increase his weight to a pound and three-quarters. This month the permanent teeth buds come in high in the gums behind the milk teeth. Now his closed eyelids will open and close, and his eyes look up, down and sideways. Dr. Liley feels that the child may perceive light through the abdominal wall (20). Dr. Still has noted that electroencephalographic waves have been obtained in forty-three to forty-five day old fetuses, and so conscious experience is possible after this date (14).

The electrophysiologic rhythm develops early. Detailed EEG tracings have been taken directly from the head end of the 16mm (crown rump) human embryo at 40-odd days of gestation in Japan (172).

Fig. 10—18 weeks.

As one writer said:

> "Thus at an early prenatal stage of life the EEG reflects a distinctly individual pattern that soon becomes truly personalized." (173)

In the sixth month, the child develops a strong muscular grip with his hands. He also starts to breathe regularly and can maintain respiratory response for twenty-four hours if born prematurely. He may even have a slim chance of surviving in an incubator. The youngest children known to survive were between twenty to twenty-five weeks old (13). The concept of viability is not a static one. Dr. Andre Hellegers of Georgetown University states that 10% of children born between twenty weeks and twenty-four weeks gestation will survive (44A and 44B). Modern medical intensive therapy has salvaged many children that would have been considered non-viable only a few years ago. The concept of an artificial placenta may be a reality in the near future and will push the date of viability back even further, and perhaps to the earliest stages of gestation (43) (48). After twenty-four to twenty-eight weeks the child's chances of survival are much greater.

Our review has covered the first six months of life. By this time the individuality of this human being is clear to all unbiased observers. Dr. Arnold Gesell has said:

> "Our own repeated observation of a large group of fetal infants (an individual born and living at any time prior to forty weeks gestation) left us with no doubt that psychologically they were individuals. Just as no two looked alike, so no two behaved precisely alike. One was impassive when another was alert. Even among the youngest there were discernable differences in vividness, reactivity and responsiveness. These were genuine individual differences, already prophetic of the diversity which distinguishes the human family." (49 at p. 172)

B. The Doctor Treats the Unborn Just as He Does Any Patient.

When one views the present state of medical science, we find that the artificial distinction between born and unborn has vanished. As Dr. Liley says:

> "In assessing fetal health, the doctor now watches changes in maternal function very carefully, for he has learned that it is actually the mother who is a passive carrier, while the fetus is very largely in charge of the pregnancy." (5 at p. 202) (65)

The new specialty of fetology is being replaced by a newer specialty called perinatology which cares for its patients from conception to about one year of extrauterine existence (56). The Cumulative Index Medicus for 1969 contains over 1400 separate articles in fetology. For the physician, the life process is a continuous one, and observation of the patient must start at the earliest period of life. (See 42 U. S. C. 289(d).)

A large number of sophisticated tools have been developed that now allow the physician to observe and measure the child's reactions from as early as ten weeks. At ten weeks it is possible to obtain the electrocardiogram of the unborn child (22) (11) (12). At this stage also the heart sounds can be detected with new ultrasonic techniques (45). The heart has already been pumping large volumes of blood to the fast growing child for six weeks. With present day technology, the heart of the child is now monitored during critical periods of the pregnancy by special electronic devices, including radiotelemetry (23) (60). Computer analysis of the child's ECG has been devised and promises more accurate monitoring and evaluation of fetal distress (14). A number of abnormal electrocardiographic patterns have been found before birth. These patterns forewarn the physician of trouble after delivery (57) (58) (62). Analysis of heart sounds through phonocardiography is also being done (25) (53).

With the new optical equipment, a physician can now look at the amniotic fluid through the cervical canal and predict life-threatening problems that are reflected by a change in the fluid's color and turbidity (26) (27). In the future, the physician will undoubtedly be able to look directly at the growing child using new fiber optic devices (through a small puncture in the uterus) and thereby diagnose and prescribe specific treatment to heal or prevent illness or deformity (21) (55).

For the child with severe anemia, the physician now gives blood, using an unusual technique developed by Dr. A. Liley of New Zealand. This life saving measure is carried out by using new image intensifier x-ray equipment. A needle is placed through the abdominal wall of the mother and into the abdominal cavity of the child. For this procedure the child must be sedated (via maternal circulation) and given pain relieving medication, since it experiences pain from the puncture and would move away from the needle if not premedicated. As Dr. H. M. I. Liley states:

> "When doctors first began invading the sanctuary of the womb, they did not know that the unborn baby would react to pain in the same fashion as a child would. But they soon learned that he would. By no means a 'vegetable' as he has so often been pictured, the unborn knows perfectly well when he has been hurt, and he will protest it just as violently as would a baby lying in a crib." (5 at p. 50)

The gastro-intestinal tract of the child is outlined by a contrast media that was previously placed in the amniotic fluid and then swallowed by the child (52). We know that the child starts to swallow as early as fourteen weeks (5).

Some children fail to get adequate nutrition when in utero. This problem can be predicted by measuring the amount of estradiol in the urine of the mother and the amount of PSP excreted after it is injected into the child (29). Recent work indicates that these nutritional problems may be solved by feeding the child more directly by introducing nutrients into the amniotic fluid which the child normally swallows (250 to 700 cc a day). In a sense, we well may be able to offer the child that is starving because of a placental defect a nipple to use before birth (30).

The amniotic fluid surrounding the unborn child offers the physician a convenient and assessable fluid that he can now test in order to diagnose a long list of diseases, just as he tests the urine and blood of his adult patients. The doctor observes the color and volume of amniotic fluid and tests it for cellular element enzymes and other chemicals. He can tell the sex of his patient and gets a more precise idea of the exact age of the child from this fluid. He can diagnose conditions such as the adrenogenital syndrome, hemolytic anemia, adrenal insufficiency, congenital hyperanemia and glycogen storage disease. Some of these, and hopefully in the future all of these, can be treated before birth (31) (32) (33) (34) (35) (36) (37).

At the time of labor, the child's blood can be obtained from scalp veins and the exact chemical balance determined before birth. These determinations have saved many children who would not have been considered in need of therapy had these tests not been done (38) (39). The fetal EEG has also been monitored during delivery (61).

A great deal of work has been done to elucidate the endocrinology of the unborn child. Growth hormone is elaborated by the child at seventy-one days, and ACTH has been isolated at eleven weeks gestation (40). The thyroid gland has been shown to function at ten and a half weeks (51), and the adrenal glands also at about this age (40). The sex hormones—estrogen and andiogen—are also found as early as nine weeks (40).

Surgical procedures performed on the unborn child are few. However, surgical cannulation of the blood vessels in an extremity of the child has been carried out in order to administer blood. Techniques are now being developed on animals that will be applicable to human problems involving the unborn child. Fetal surgery is now a reality in the animal laboratory, and will soon offer help to unborn patients (28) (41) (42).

The whole thrust of medicine is in support of the notion that the child in its mother is a distinct individual in need of the most diligent study and care, and that he is also a patient whom science and medicine treats just as it does any other person (21) (5).

This review of the current medical status of the unborn serves us several purposes. Firstly, it shows conclusively the humanity of the fetus by showing that human life is a continuum which commences in the womb. There is no magic in birth. The child is as much a child in those several days before birth as he is those several days after. The maturation process, commenced in the womb, continues through the post-natal period, infancy, adolescence, maturity and old age. Dr. Arnold Gesell points out in his famous book that no king ever had any other beginning than have had all of us in our mother's womb (49).

Secondly, we have shown that quickening is a relative concept which depends upon the sensitivity of the mother, the position of the placenta, and the size of the child. At the common law, the fetus was not considered alive before quickening*, and therefore we can understand why commentators like Bracton and Coke placed so much emphasis on quickening. But modern science has proven conclusively that any law based upon quickening is based upon shifting sands—a subjective standard even different among races. We now know that life precedes quickening; that quickening is nothing other than the mother's first subjective feeling of movement in the womb. Yet the fetus we know has moved before this. In spite of these advances in medicine, some courts and legislatures have continued to consider quickening as the point when life is magically infused into the unborn. (See Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp. 293) No concept could be further from the scientific truth.

Thirdly, we have seen that viability is also a flexible standard which changes with the advance of these new medical disciplines some of which are hardly a half dozen years old. New studies in artificial placentas indicates that

*See 4 Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, 394-95 (1769) where it is said:

"In case this plea is made in stay of execution, the judge must direct a jury of twelve matrons or discreet women to inquire the fact, and if they bring in their verdict 'quick with child' (for barely, 'with child', unless it be alive in the womb, is not sufficient, . . .)" viability will become an even more relative concept and children will survive outside of the womb at even earlier ages than the 20-28 weeks in the past. Fetology and perinatology are only a few years old as specialties. Obstetrics is only sixty years old as a specialty.

Fourthly, we have seen that the unborn child is as much a patient as is the mother. In all the literature opting for permissive abortion, this simple truth is ignored. There are many doctors who know that the unborn is also their patient and that they must exercise their art for the benefit of both mother and child. When the physician accepts that he has two patients, he has no difficulty applying his skill for the benefit of child and mother. Every doctor practicing can tell this court when in his medical judgment an abortion is necessary to preserve life. There is no medical mystery on that point. A review of the relevant obstetrics texts will list the indications—psychiatric as well—for therapeutic abortion* When the doctor makes the decision

*See Quay, Justifiable Abortion, 49 Georgetown Law Journal 173, 1960, pp. 180-241, where the medical reasons for therapeutic abortions as stated in the standard obstetric works from 1903 to 1960 are stated and analyzed. Dr. Guttmacher has stated:

"On the whole, the over-all frequency of therapeutic abortion is on the decline. This is due to two facts: first, cures have been discovered for a number of conditions which previously could be cured only by termination of pregnancy; and second, there has been a change in medical philosophy. Two decades ago, the accepted attitude of the physicians was that if a pregnant woman were ill, the thing to do would be to rid her of her pregnancy. Today it is felt that unless the pregnancy itself intensifies the illness, nothing is accomplished by the abortion." (66 at p. 13) (See also 67).

Dr. Guttmacher has also said:

"Today it is possible for almost any patient to be brought through pregnancy alive, unless she suffers from a fatal illness such as cancer or lukemia and, if so, abortion would be unlikely to prolong, much less save, life." (68 at p. 9).

Dr. Guttmacher has also said:

"There is little evidence that pregnancy in itself worsens a psychosis, either intensifying it or rendering prognosis for full recovery less likely." (69 at p. 121).

he must not consider the unborn as "mere tissue of the mother" or he will certainly weigh it no more in the balance than any other replaceable tissue of the mother.

III.

MEDICAL HAZARDS OF LEGALLY INDUCED ABORTION.

The medical hazards of legally induced abortion are all too often compared to the safety of a tonsillectomy or the "proverbial tooth extraction". (See Texas Appellant's brief p. 33.) Data presented from Eastern European mortality statistics have often been used to produce such claims as "it is X-times safer to have an abortion than to carry the child to term". These claims have been widely published in newspapers and lay periodicals; when made by the non-professional, they are forgivable; when made by "medical experts", one can only assume that these "experts" have allowed a desire for "social change" to fog their ability to distinguish first-rate from second-rate medical care.

The world's medical literature does not support such claims. The medical hazards of legal abortion should be presented to the Court in their total perspective through an analysis of this literature. It is imperative to note that when one focuses only on the legal abortion mortality rates from selected countries around the world, one can only see the risks of legal abortion through tunnel vision. The total medical picture cannot be understood without a look at the early and late physical and psychological complications. Indeed, these are the complications which affect the greater number of people and result in what a World Health Organization scientific group said was "a great amount of human suffering" (70).

A. Professional Organizations Speak on Medical Hazards.

The Executive Board of the American College of Obstetrics and Gynecology (ACOG) and a majority of its fellows approved the following official statement in May, 1968:

> "It is emphasized that the inherent risk of such an abortion is not fully appreciated both by many in the profession and certainly not by the public. . . . The public should realize that in countries or societies that permit abortion on demand, many, if not the majority, are performed in physicians' offices. Under these circumstances it is reasonable to conclude that the mortality from this operation may exceed the maternal mortality of the United States (emphasis ours) and Canada while the incidence of serious complications is substantial." (71)

The minority report was prepared by Sprague H. Gardiner, M.D., Bernard J. Pisani, M.D. and Richard Mattingly, M.D., and was issued in May, 1969. It stated:

> "The inherent risks of a therapeutic abortion are serious and may be life-threatening; this fact should be fully appreciated by both the medical profession and the public. In nations where abortion may be obtained on demand, a considerable morbidity and mortality have reported." (71)

On March 26, 1966, the Council of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists unanimously approved the following statement which supports the ACOG statement:

> "Those without specialists' knowledge and these include members of the medical profession, are influenced in adopting what they regard as a humanitarian attitude to the induction of abortion by a failure to appreciate what is involved. They tend to regard induction of abortion as a trivial operation, free from risk. In fact, even to the expert working in the best conditions, the removal of an early pregnancy after dilating the cervix can be difficult, and is not infrequently accompanied by serious complications. This is particularly true in the case of the woman pregnant for the first time. For women who have a serious medical indication for termination of pregnancy, induction of abortion is extremely hazardous and its risks need to be weighed carefully against those involved in leaving the pregnancy undisturbed. Even for the relatively healthy woman, however, the dangers are considerable." (72)

In 1970, the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists re-emphasized:

"The risks of any of the currently available methods of terminating pregnancy, which involve general anaesthesia, have always been recognized by gynaecologists but have been dismissed by others as non-existent and imaginary. The long-term hazards to physical well-being require follow-up studies which so far have not been undertaken in this country. Nevertheless, reports from other countries where abortion on demand has been the rule for several years show that late physical ill-effects are not uncommon." (73)

On March 26, 1970, the Medical Society of the State of New York issued a set of "abortion guidelines" in which they wrote:

"The Medical Society of the State of New York would like to caution all physicians that an abortion performed after the twelfth week of gestation is fraught with tremendous danger." (74)

In the Consultants Report on Abortion from the survey done by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in Great Britain, it was said:

"Eight maternal deaths occurred in relation to 27,331 terminations of pregnancy during the year 1968-69. This gives a mortality rate of 0.3 per thousand (30/100,000), which is higher than the maternal mortality rate (including abortion, criminal or otherwise) for all the pregnancies in England and Wales at the comparable time. A statement issued by the Secretary of State to Parliament on 4 February, 1970 reveals a similar state of affairs in respect of about 54,000 induced abortions notified from all sources during 1969; among these there were 15 maternal deaths." (75)

B. New York City Abortion Data Unreliable.

On June 29, 1971, Mr. Gordon Chase, the administrator of The Health Services Administration for the City of New York (and a strong advocate of abortion) announced that "we have a remarkable record of safety" when New York's mortality rate is compared to other countries like Great Britain and Scandinavia (76). He announced this rate to be 5.3 deaths/100,000 abortions (77). This mortality rate, quite honestly, cannot be taken seriously.

It should first be pointed out that 55.5% of all the 150,629 abortions legally performed in New York City between July 1, 1970 and May 31, 1971 were performed on out-of-state residents, and another 3.3% were done on residents of New York State who were not residents of New York City (78). Thus, 58.8% of the legal abortions were inherently difficult to follow up. This is reflected in a report from the New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center, which showed that 53.5% of their patients were lost to follow up (79). Many physicians are currently treating women who are suffering severe complications from New York abortions and these cases will never appear in Mr. Chase's statistics. In fact, hair-raising anecdotes of "fall-out" from New York City abortions are related everywhere (80).

Robert E. Hall, M.D., a leading proponent of legal abortion, addressing the 27th Midwest Clinical Conference of the Chicago Medical Society, said that one abortion clinic in New York City has been performing 700 each week, with no after-care (81). He also said that because the caseload is five times greater than hospitals can handle, unaffiliated clinics have mushroomed. Facilities are being bought or built, one of them close to Kennedy Airport, to accommodate out-of-state women who fly in, have the abortion, and fly out the same day (82).

Joseph J. Rovinsky, M.D. reported that "it is noteworthy that the medical services at all three New York City area airports have since July 1, 1970 experienced a vast increase in the number of women requiring assistance for sequelae of induced abortion or actually aborting at the airport!" (83) Dr. Hall concludes that this situation leads to the neglect of complications when they arise, the rate of which has been high (84).

The 5.3 rate in New York City was arrived at by disregarding 7 abortion deaths in New York City on the unsubstantiated theory that these 7 were not performed ". . . under legal auspices" (85). At an earlier time Rovinsky concluded that ". . . the estimated maternal mortality rate is 38 Per 100,000!" (86) He also says that we cannot be certain that even these figures are complete (87):

> "There is at least one apocryphal story circulating about an abortion death in a physician's office from air embolisation when an aspiration pump acted as a pressure rather than a suction device; following which the woman's corpse was transported back to her home state and the true cause of death there was not recorded". (88)

Just how many women have died as the result of a New York City abortion will never be known. However, deaths resulting from legal abortion in New York City which do not appear in the Health Services Administration's statistics have been reported in Indiana (89), and Boston (91). How many others have followed a similar, but unregistered, course will forever be unknown.

C. Eastern European Abortion Mortality Rates Complex and Often Incomplete.

The proponents of abortion are, however, quick to point out the incredibly low abortion mortality rates from countries in Eastern Europe. While focusing only on data from Eastern Europe, they make the claim that "induced abortion is potentially X-times as safe as the process of going through ordinary childbirth". Whether this claim is fabricated or based on facts needs further close scrutiny.

In Table One, a number of countries with vast experience in performing legal abortions are compared.

TABLE ONE: ABORTION MORTALITY vs. MATERNAL MORTALITY.

Country/State	Year	Legal Abortions	Deaths	Abortion Mortality/ 100,000 Abortions	Maternal Mortality/ 100,000 Live Births
Denmark (92)	1961-66	27,435	9	30	10-20
England and Wales (93)	1968-69	27,331	8	30	Abortion mortality higher than maternal mortality
Sweden (94)	1960-66	30,600	12	39	14.0 (95)
Yugoslavia (Skopje Univ.) (96) (106)	1965-68	18,758	2	10.6	96.5 (97)
Hungary (98)	1964-68	939,800	11	1.2	49.7 (99)
Oregon (100)	1970	7,196	1	13.9	8.4
Maryland (101)	1968-70	7,664	3	40.5	23.1 (102)

The first thing to note is that in Denmark, England, Wales, Sweden, Oregon and Maryland, the mortality resulting from legal abortion exceeds the mortality from childbirth. Secondly, it seems that only Eastern European countries have legal abortion mortality rates which are less than the corresponding maternal mortality rates. To see this in perspective, one must recognize that Denmark and Sweden have been legally inducing abortion 10-15 years longer than any Eastern European country, and thus have a much greater experience (103).

Finally, one cannot ignore the extraordinarily large maternal mortality rates which exist in Yugoslavia and Hungary—mortality rates which are 2-4 times higher than the maternal mortality in the United States (104). The maternal mortality rate is an excellent indication of the quality of medical care given to the whole population of women in each country. Indeed, in Eastern European countries that are considered ". . . not as sophisticated, medically developed or experienced" (105), one would expect the high maternal mortality rate, but hardly the declared expertise in performing legal abortions.

Indeed, some Eastern European investigators have admitted that complications are almost certainly underreported because patients treated outside of hospitals are seldom included in hospital statistics (106). It has been said, however, that the mortality rates in Eastern Europe are so incredibly low largely because 95-100% of their abortions are done in the first trimester of pregnancy. It is certainly recognized that abortion in the later stages of pregnancy will result in a higher abortion mortality rate (107), and that this may account for some of the increased abortion mortality in Western and Northern Europe. However, one cannot make all of these claims until one examines the data more carefully.

Table Two examines the legal abortion mortality rates of various countries in which the deaths resulted from legal abortions performed only in the first trimester of pregnancy.

Country/State	Year	Abortions 1st Trimester	Deaths	Abortion Mortality/ 100,000 Abortions	Maternal Mortality/ 100,000 Live Births
Denmark (92)	1961-66	8,684	2	23.0	10-20
Yugoslavia (Skopje Univ.) (96) (106)	1965-68	7,833	2	25.5	96.5 (97)
Hungary (98)	1964-68	939,800	11	1.2	49.7 (99)
Oregon (100)	1970	5,351	1	18.6	8.4

*Breakdown data for England and Wales and Sweden are not available. There were no early abortion deaths in Maryland 1968-70, but a relatively small number (3,900) were performed early (101).

Here it can again be adequately shown that while most countries find legal abortion safer in the first trimester, the mortality from abortion continues to exceed that of childbirth; Eastern European countries continue to be noteworthy exceptions. The Hungarian data, however, is not in line with what is seen in Denmark, Oregon, or even its Eastern European ally, Yugoslavia.

Finally, let us look at one other method of examining abortion mortality data—a method which has not been overlooked by the proponents of abortion (108), but, nonetheless, a method which is seldom openly discussed. In Table Three the total number of abortion deaths (from all causes—spontaneous, criminal and legally induced) are compared for Hungary and the United States.

TABLE THREE: ABORTION DEATHS (ALL CAUSES) PER UNIT POPULATION.*

Country	Abortion Deaths 1967 (All Causes)	Est. 1967 Population	Abortion Deaths 1,000,000 Population
Hungary	21 (98)	10,255,000	2.06
United States	160 (109)	197,576,952	0.80

*All population figures are from Encyclopedia Americana.

While 1967 has been selected for comparison, there is little differences in whatever year one would like to consider. There were 21 abortion deaths in Hungary, and 160 abortion deaths in the United States in 1967. The figure for the United States is larger, however, one must remember that the population of the United States is considerably larger so that in order to compare the risks of abortion in the two countries, one must compare the abortion deaths per unit population (obviously, the United States with a larger population would be expected to have a larger number of deaths due to any cause, including abortions). When this comparison is made, one can see that for any individual woman, the risk of dying from abortion (all causes) is 2.6 times as great in Hungary than it is in the United States.

In summary, the Eastern European abortion mortality statistics are noteworthy in the following areas:

A) Their abortion mortality rates are incredibly low when compared to countries who have a greater experience.

B) The maternal mortality in Eastern Europe is astoundingly high, and this is an excellent indication of the quality of medical care delivered to the total population of women.

C) Hungarian women are 2.6 times more likely to die from abortion than American women.

Some very important observations can be made from this total perspective analysis:

1. Where the maternal mortality rate is so large (in Hungary) and where the loss from abortion of all causes is so great (also Hungary), one would not expect to see one area of such great perfection as the figures for their legal abortion mortality would claim. As a result, one can seriously question if all the induced abortion deaths are being reported, or if, perhaps, some of them are hidden in the maternal mortality and abortion (all causes) mortality rates.

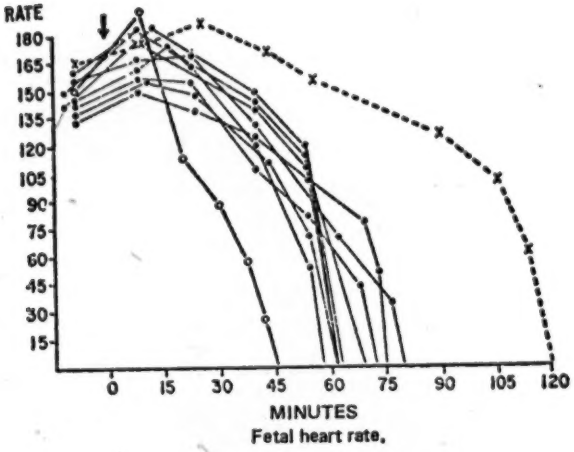
2. If, on the other hand, we assume that the number of legal abortion deaths is correct, then one of the following must be true:
   a) Hungarian physicians are not as capable at treating spontaneous abortions as physicians in the United States. However, with their claimed expertise at performing legal abortions, one would not expect this to be true.
   b) The number of criminal abortions in Hungary is still amazingly high, and this accounts for the large number of "other" abortion deaths—all of this in spite of a phenomenal number of legal abortions (126 legal abortions/100 live births in 1967). (98)
3. The individual Hungarian woman is 2.6 times more likely to die from abortion, and 2.0 times more likely to die from childbirth than the individual woman in the United States. This very real difference in health care to women in these two countries is an express manifestation of the total respect for human life which has been the challenging force through which the medical profession in the United States has built its fantastic progress.

It can readily be seen from this analysis that the interpretation of abortion mortality rates can be very complex. To make exorbitant claims regarding the safety of legal abortion from these statistics is simply not justified. The claim that abortion is X-times as safe as childbirth is a fabrication invented to sell abortion. Furthermore, when one focuses only on mortality rates and disregards all other complications which may arise from legal abortion, then advocacy has replaced medical scholarship.

D. Child Mortality.

The obstetrician has two patients: mother and child. It is deplorable to think that discussions of mortality can so easily exclude the child. The court should recognize that the mortality to the child is nearly 100%. Only an occassional child has the strength to survive. (81) (110). Let us not forget that abortion kills children of varying ages and stages in development. The unheard voices of these little ones are our concern, and we deplore this violent trend which is turning the healing art of medicine into a source of efficient swift and sure destruction of human life. A trend which will yield a "body count" unlike any we have seen in our nation's history. We deplore the condition of a society which calls physicians to exercise their art as a tool of death for those yet unborn, and which turns our learned journals into horrible examples of humans reporting the exact and scientific countdown and another human heart from 180 beats per minute to zero and death (110 at p. 37):

> "In midtrimester 'salting out' cases, however, I am aware of only two such incidents. [Live born fetus] Both occurred between 24-26 weeks' gestation and otherwise were uncomplicated cases with 56 and 73 hour total instillation-abortion time. The infants lived only for a few minutes. Other known cases with fetal survival were admittedly early third trimester (26 weeks) cases. Fifteen consecutive cases monitored for fetal heart rate are illustrated in Fig. 3. The majority of the fetal hearts are undetectable one hour following the deposition of the hypertonic solution in the amniotic sac."



Fetal heart rate.

E. Other Complications.

"Abortion may impair a woman's health through a variety of complications. These may occur at the time of or soon after the abortion, or be discovered much later, perhaps in connection with another pregnancy or with efforts to become pregnant again. The complications may result in the death of the woman." (111)

F. Early Physical Complications.

The most common early complication of legally induced abortion are infection, hemorrhage, perforation of the uterus and laceration of the cervix. Table Four lists a representative sample of studies which have been done around the world and in the United States to define the incidence of early physical complications.

Olsen, et al. have stated:

> "It is clearly apparent that all methods involve a risk of more or less serious complications, ranging in the present material from 3-10% with the various methods, the incidence of complications increasing with the stage of pregnancy". (92)

TABLE FOUR: % EARLY PHYSICAL COMPLICATIONS IN 1st AND 2nd TRIMESTER ABORTION.

Country/Investigator	1st Trimester	2nd Trimester
Denmark (92) (Olsen, Nielsen, Ostergaard)	5.4%	2.5 – 9.1%
California (112) (Banner, et al.)	11.0%	17.0%
New York City (113) (Kaye—NY Lying-In)	2.5%	12.7%
Elmhurst, N. Y. (80) (Rovinsky—City Hospital Center)	5.0%	15.6%
Rochester, N. Y. (114) (Choate—Strong Memorial Hosp.)	8.2%	12.6%
Poland (115) (Midak)	4.4%	—
Czechoslovakia (116) (Kotasek)	5.0%	—
Sweden (117) (Bengtsson)	—	9.4 –10.1%
Great Britain (118) (Menzies)	—	30.8%
Japan (119) (Wagatsuma)	—	14.0%

There is evidence to suggest that these complications are far more frequent in the young woman pregnant for the first time, presumably because the mouth of her womb is much more rigid and thus more difficult to dilate than in a woman who has had at least one child (116) (120). Note that 57.3% of abortions performed in New York City from July 1, 1970 to May 31, 1971 were performed on women pregnant for the first time (121).

Infection may be localized to the lining of the womb, the Fallopian tubes, or the structures immediately adjacent to the uterus (endometritis, sal pingitis or parametritis). It may be more regionally located resulting in pelvic thrombophlebitis, pelvic cellulitis or pelvic peritonitis. It may be distant as infection in pneumonia, endocarditis, or septic emboli to the lungs or brain. Or, the infection may be generalized as in septicemia (122). The infection is usually the direct result of the instrumentation involved in the abortive techniques, and is the usual cause of any subsequent sterility because the infection scars the tubes to a point where they no longer function properly.

Hemorrhage is not uncommon following induced abortion even in early pregnancy. The uterus is a highly vascular organ during pregnancy because of its natural response to the life support of the child. Hemorrhage usually results when this vascular organ is lacerated, perforated, ruptured, fails to contract after the abortion (uterine atony), or there is a failure to remove all of the parts of the child and his placenta (122). In the first year of the Colorado abortion law, 8.0% of women undergoing the operation needed a blood transfusion (the majority of these abortions were done in the first trimester). (123) (For a discussion of the inherent dangers of blood transfusions—allergic reactions, serum hepatitis, etc., see Merritt, J. A., et al., MANAGEMENT OF EMERGENCIES: UNTOWARD REACTIONS TO BLOOD TRANSFUSION. N. E. J. M. 274: 1426, 1966.) In a series of 100 early suction abortions performed by Robert E. Hall, M.D., at least 5% had "excessive blood loss" (greater than 350 cc). (124) Of course, not all women will require blood transfusion, but Carlton, et al., noted that 30% of his series were anemic following abortion (hemoglobin less than 9.0 gms.) and of those done in the first trimester 9% were anemic (125).

Perforation of the uterus occurs in about 1.0% of legally induced abortions, and may occur with the traditional D&C or the newer method of suction curettage (92, 112, 113). Perforation occurs primarily because the surgeon operates by "touch" alone, and not under direct vision. Secondly, the pregnant uterus is much softer than the non-pregnant uterus, lending itself to easy perforation. If in the process of perforation the bowel or a blood vessel is torn, overwhelming infection and/or hemorrhage may occur necessitating exploratory abdominal surgery. (It has been reported that 30-65% with such a perforation will require this type of exploratory surgery.) (126, 127).

Early physical complications that are very significant when they occur, but are less frequent, include the following:

a) Coma and/or convulsions because of the effects on the central nervous system and/or kidneys of hypertonic salt solution entering the bloodstream directly or via the peritoneal cavity (128).

b) Embolisation of air, most commonly, or by particulate matter (fat, placental products, amniotic fluid) in the heart, pulmonary artery, brain and other organs (128).

c) Anesthetic accidents resulting in cardiac arrest or aspiration pneumonia (128).

d) Disturbances in the coagulability of the mother's blood (129, 130, 131, 132).

e) The abortion of only one twin while the other survives and delivers normally several months later (125, 133). The psychological effects on the mother and the surviving twin in such cases has not been investigated.

f) It is now becoming apparent that, contrary to wishful thinking, abortion can be a relatively uncomfortable procedure. For early abortion many patients can be managed adequately with mild sedation and paracervical local anesthesia, but for a "considerable" number this is not sufficient to provide satisfactory analgesia, nor to prevent agitated and abrupt pelvic movements which can only contribute to increasing the complication rate (134).

G. The Late Physical Complications of Legally Induced Abortion.

The late physical complications of legally induced abortion have as yet been incompletely evaluated, and there is literally nothing from the American Medical literature which would be of help. Nonetheless, there is a copious amount of information available from the experience of other countries, and this is now presenting substantial evidence to suggest that it is in this category that the most significant medical and ultimate sociological sequelae exist.

Through increased knowledge and experience, we are now beginning to see and understand how our careless use of natural resources and destruction of, or interruption of, natural life cycles in land, water and air is having a disastrous impact on environment. Nobody really knows for certain what results we might see in a few years in women and those dependent upon them if the natural human life cycle within them is radically interferred with. However, some insight into the ultimate ecological disaster may be gathered by a close look at the late physical and psychological complications.

1. Premature Labor and Delivery.

The prematurity rate in Hungary in 1954 (before legalized abortion) was 7%. However, in 1968 (14 years after legalization) it had increased to 12% (135). The incidence of prematurity developing in any one individual has been shown to be well correlated with the number of abortions a woman has. Hungarian studies revealed that the likelihood of premature labor and delivery following one previous abortion increased to 14%; after two abortions, to 18%; and after three abortions, to 24% (135). In Czechoslovakia a comparison of women who have never had a previous legal abortion with women who had such a history revealed the prematurity rate in the former group to be 5%, while in the latter group it had increased to 14% (136). Similar experience has also been seen in Japan (137). The increase in prematurity is a direct result of the instrumentation required in early abortion; dilating the cervix (the mouth of the womb) may leave the cervix incompetent to retain the child for the full nine months (137).

The significance of this trend lies in the fact that premature birth is the leading cause of infant death, and one of the leading causes of mental and motor retardation (138). This is reflected in the extraordinarily high infant mortality rate in Hungary due to birth injury, post-natal asphyxia and atalectasis (the leading causes of death in the premature infant)—1,278.2 per 100,000 live births (95), compared to a similar death rate in the United States of 549.4 per 100,000 live births (95). Indeed, there "has been a doubling of the perinatal mortality rate in Hungary following the introduction of 'abortion on request' (106)". Thus, Klinger concludes:

> "Induced abortion plays an important role in the development of a subsequent child" and that "the impact of premature birth on infant mortality and of the mental and physical development of the child is connected with the frequency of abortions" (135).

2. Ectopic Pregnancies.

A number of countries have reported a significant increase in the incidence of ectopic pregnancy (pregnancies which occur someplace other than in the womb, usually in the Fallopian tube). (139, 140) One Japanese study revealed that 3.9% of women with previous history of legal abortion had a subsequent ectopic pregnancy (141). This is eight times the incidence of ectopic pregnancy in the United States. (The incidence of ectopic pregnancy in the United States in 1967 was about 0.5%.) (142) An ectopic pregnancy is not infrequently life-threatening because of rupture and hemorrhage. This, therefore, subjects an individual woman to a very substantial future risk. The risk of dying from an ectopic pregnancy in the United States is approximately 300 per 100,000 (142). Again, tubal malfunction, usually secondary to post-abortal infection, seems to be the prime cause.

3. Complications with Subsequent Pregnancies (Pathologic Sequelae).

The incidence of spontaneous abortion (miscarriage) in women with a history of legal abortion is reported to be 30-40% higher than in those without such a history (116, 137, 143), and the incidence of fetal death during pregnancy is twice as great (143). Complicated labors (prolonged labor, placenta, previa, adherent placenta) (106, 116, 136, 143, 144) and excessive bleeding at the time of delivery (136) have also been noted to occur more commonly in subsequent pregnancies to women with a previous history of legal abortion. These all result in increased obstetrical intervention.

4. Sterility.

Several studies "prove that repeated abortions can cause secondary sterility" (98). One report from Poland showed that 6.9% of women were sterile on a 4-5 year follow-up (115) and in Japan 9.7% were subsequently sterile on a 3 year follow-up (141). Other countries have had a similar experience (116, 145, 146). Sterility results primarily as an after-effect of post-abortal infections resulting in tubal obstruction and or malfunction. Eminent British gynecologist, T. N. A. Jeffecoate's comment is particularly pertinent here:

> "If this happens when a first pregnancy is interrupted for a non-recurrent indication, such as rubella or a fleeting psychological upset, the situation is tragic." (147)

5. Transplacental Hemorrhage.

It has long been known that a woman who is Rh negative is very susceptible to a special kind of problem if her consort is Rh positive. Any given pregnancy may be a stimulus for the mother to develop antibodies against the baby's red blood cells (i.e. she becomes sensitized) so that in a subsequent pregnancy these antibodies may destroy the baby's red blood cells resulting in an anemia in the preborn child which may be life-threatening in utero, or subject him to the threat of mental and motor retardation after he is born. This sensitization occurs through the leakage of the baby's red blood cells into the mother's circulation (transplacental hemorrhage) usually at the time of delivery. Therefore, first-born children are rarely affected. However, with all methods of legally induced abortion, sensitization has been reported to occur in 3-10% of Rh-negative women (148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154). This can now be effectively treated with the recent development of anti-Rh-negative gammaglobulin (Rho Gam)

and its routine use in the abortion of Rh-negative women has been frequently recommended (154, 155). However, because certain tests on the fetus cannot be performed, many women will be needlessly exposed to therapy. And, in spite of the existence of this effective therapy, there is good evidence to suggest that it is being grossly neglected. In a study conducted by the New York State Department of Health on women having abortions in all of New York State, 48.7% of women known to be Rh-negative were left untreated, and thus unprotected from the possibility of sensitization and its inherent risks in subsequent pregnancies (156).

6. Other Late Physical Complications.

a. A woman's sexual libido is reported to be decreased in 14-33% of women with a previous legal abortion. This is theoretically related to the psychotraumatic experience of the interruption and the emotional weakness that follows (115, 157).

b. Endometriosis is a common sequel to hysterotomy (158).

c. Many pregnancies which are subsequent to an abortion performed by hysterotomy will need delivery by Caesarian section to eliminate the possibility of rupture of the hysterotomy scar (133).

d. Gross irregularity in the appearance of the menstrual period, heavy bleeding with the menses or complete absence of menstruation has been reported in 1-12% of patients who have had legal abortions (115, 143, 159).

H. Psychiatric Sequelae.

A World Health Organization scientific group concluded that "There is no doubt that the termination of pregnancy may precipitate a serious psychoneurotic or even psychotic reaction in a susceptible individual" (160). Some investigators have indeed noted lasting psychiatric reactions (161). However, there has been much variation in the medical literature regarding the incidence of psychological sequelae to induced abortion.

The Swedish experience with therapeutic abortion has been well documented with several well planned studies. The best of these studies is Dr. Martin Ekblad's. He studied 479 women at the time of the abortion and again 2-3½ years later. At follow-up he found that 10% continued to feel the operation unpleasant; 14% had mild self-reproach; 11% had serious self-reproach and self-regret; and 1% had gross psychiatric breakdowns (162).

Siegfried, in 1951, reported on 61 women followed for 2 years after abortion, and found 13% to have serious self-reproach (163). Niswander and Patterson, in 1967, studied 90 women aborted for psychogenic reasons, and found that 21 had an immediate negative effect, and 11 had a negative long-term effect (at least 8 months). Eleven of 17 aborted for rubella had an immediate negative reaction, and 8 of those 17 continued to have a long-term negative reaction (164).

Recent studies have shown "that serious mental disorders arise more often in women with previous emotional problems; thus the very women for whom legal abortion is considered to be justified on psychiatric grounds are the ones who have the highest risk of post-abortal psychiatric disorders" (165).

The interpretation of the results of psychiatric studies is always made difficult by the lack of uniform standards for the assessment of psychological impairment and of suitable control groups (165). Unfortunately, over the last few years several unscientific papers have appeared in the medical literature, written by advocates of abortion, blindly stating that psychiatric sequelae of abortion are a myth (166, 167). For this reason, the court is invited to read Simon and Senturia's excellent review and critical analysis of the available psychological literature in this area (168), and Heath's excellent review (169).

Most abortion proponents not involved in public efforts to promote their cause, admit that elective removal of the fetus is without psychiatric or medical justification. The fetus has not been shown to be a direct cause of any emotional disorder, and present medical capabilities make pregnancies safe. Almost always, other means than abortion are available to handle any medical or psychiatric complications of pregnancy. Indeed, if a woman wants her child, there are no medical or psychiatric indications that ever make an abortion necessary.

Sloane has candidly clarified the question of "indications" for abortion: (170)

> "There are no clear-cut psychiatric indications for therapeutic abortion. The risk of precipitation or exaccerbation of an existing psychosis is small and unpredictabe, and suicide is rare."

He goes further, relying on experiences in Sweden:

> "There is no medical indication for a termination of a new pregnancy, for they are not ill, or it is, at all events, not possible to point to any illness that might constitute a serious threat to life or health and thus indicate an induced abortion."

Since Sloane is a proponent of abortion, his forthrightness about the lack of genuine indications is laudable. Recognizing that there is no scientific basis for abortion on psychiatric or medical grounds, he, like many others, would justify abortion on the basis of what he calls "a key issue" of "unwillingness" to continue the pregnancy, which is scientifically neither a diagnosis nor an easily measured variable.

Barno (171) has found that the fear of suicide in pregnant women has been greatly exaggerated. In fact, his study reveals that the chances of a suicide in pregnancy, even amongst women who threaten suicide, is substantially less than the chances of suicide amongst women as a whole.

I. Conclusion.

The medical hazards of legally induced abortion are significant and must be recognized. When one focuses only on selected abortion mortality rates from Eastern Europe to make claims regarding the safety of legally induced abortion, one is looking for a motive to sell abortion. While the mortality rates alone do not present a total perspective analysis, they should not, on the other hand, be isolated from the 100% mortality, numbering already in the hundreds of thousands, of innocent unborn children. Indeed, one must recognize that the performance of legally induced abortion upon healthy women is not the practice of medicine at all, but rather another example of the violence of our times; the use of one more technological skill to destroy human life.

IV.

THE UNBORN OFFSPRING OF HUMAN PARENTS IS A PERSON WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE 5TH AND 14TH AMENDMENTS OF THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

A. The Standard for Decision.

This Court has considered the constitutionality of legal classifications numerous times. Under the due process clause of the 5th Amendment, and the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment, the strictness of the standard for decision in cases involving classifications made by legislative bodies varies according to the nature of the right placed in jeopardy; the more fundamental the right involved, the greater the judicial requirement to "carefully and meticulously scrutinize"[1] the classification in light of the following principles.

a. As the right in jeopardy becomes more fundamental, the more perfect must be the relationship between the classification excluding a human group from the enjoyment of the right and the purpose for which the classification is made.[2]

b. As the right involved becomes more fundamental, the more "compelling" the state or governmental interest must be in making a classification excluding certain human groups from the enjoyment of the right.[3]

In addition, classifications affecting fundamental rights are said to be "especially suspect"[4] or, to use Mr. Justice White's expression, such classifications are "constitutionally suspect".[5]

3. The "compelling governmental interest" doctrine has developed in several recent cases. See Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U. S. 618, 89 S. Ct. 1322 (1969), particularly Mr. Justice Harlan's dissent; see also Mr. Justice White's concurring opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479, 85 S. Ct. 1628 (1965).

B. The Court Must Apply This Same Standard to Itself.

The Court, in interpreting laws, performs a quasi-legislative or a subordinate legislative function.[6] It performs this interstitial legislative function by supplementing the written law by supplying definitions.[7]

In these cases the Court must construe, interpret and define the expression "person" in the 5th and 14th Amendments. In fixing the limits of the word "person" in the 5th and 14th Amendments, the Court will, in essence, perform a classificatory function; in other words, the Court must decide, on the basis of some established criteria whether, for the cases at bar, the unborn person belongs to the class of persons encompassed, and therefore protected, by the term "person" as used in the "due process" clause of the 5th Amendment and "equal protection" and "due process" clauses of the 14th Amendment.

The "due process" clause of the 5th Amendment and the "equal protection" clause of the 14th Amendment to the U. S. Constitution require that "Cities, States and the Federal Government . . . exercise their powers so as not to discriminate between their inhabitants except upon some reasonable differentiation fairly related to the object of the regulation".[8] Expressed differently, the Constitution prohibits "invidious discrimination" by the State.

The concepts of "State" and "Federal Government", as used above, refer to the different agencies through which

R., "The Process of Judicial Legislation", in Law and the Social Order (1933); also collected in Cohen, Readings in Jurisprudence and Legal Philosophy; Pound, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Law, Yale University Press, page 53; Grey, The Nature and Sources of the Law (2 ed. 1921) pp. 172-173; Fuller, The Morality of Law, Yale University Press, p. 81H.

the "State or Federal Government" may act. And this includes judicial authorities[9] as well as legislative and executive authorities. The Courts have, therefore, a constitutional duty equal to that of Congress and the various State legislatures to avoid "invidious discriminations" in the course of making classifications in the exercise of their interpretive and quasi-legislative functions.

C. Application of the Standard for Decision to the Case at Bar—The Rules of Construction Applied.

By attempting to strike down the criminal abortion statutes of Texas and Georgia, the Court is implicitly deciding whether unborn offspring of human parents are "persons" within the meaning of the 5th and 14th Amendments, and thereby classifying such offspring as to whether they may be "deprived of life". Since this is the most fundamental of all rights[10] the Court is bound by its own teachings to apply the most strict of standards.

Likewise because of the fundamental nature of life, the most compelling of all interests would have to be shown on the part of the Court in order to carve out such a classification, which would exclude the lives of unborn humans from the protection of the law.

Appellants argue that a "compelling state interest" must be shown to justify the restrictions imposed by these criminal abortion statutes on their freedom to have the unborn killed, or their freedom as physicians to perform the abortions. We argue that the "compelling" state interest doctrine instead limits the right of either State or Federal government to classify the unborn as "non-person" and thereby permit the deprivation of their lives.

9. See, e.g., Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 25 L. Ed. 667, where the Court said: "It is doubtless true that a State may act through different agencies, either by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities; and prohibitions of the amendments extend to all action of the State denying equal protection of the laws, whether it be action by one of those agencies or by another", 100 U. S. at 318. (emphasis added) see, more recently, Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 92 L. Ed. 161, 68 S. Ct. 836 (1948), and Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U. S. 249, 97 L. Ed. 1586, 93 S. Ct. 1031 (1953).

Consequently, in interpreting and construing the word "person" as used in the 5th and 14th Amendments, the Court must be constantly aware (1) that the right in jeopardy is the most fundamental of all legal rights, being necessary and basic to the enjoyment of all other legal rights; (2) that no compelling governmental interest in excluding the unborn from constitutional protection under the 5th and 14th Amendments has ever been shown, and that classifications affecting fundamental human rights are "especially" or "constitutionally suspect". Based on these rules of construction, the unborn offspring of human parents are to be given every benefit of doubt, to be afforded every advantage.

These standards for decision considered in light of the scientific fact that the unborn offspring of human parents is an autonomous human being,[11] and in light of the legal fact that the unborn is a legal person in numerous other areas of the laws,[12] compel the conclusion that the word "person" as used in the 5th and 14th Amendments includes unborn persons.

The 5th Amendment protects all persons against arbitrary action by the State. "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law". If the word "person" in the 5th Amendment is construed to mean 11. See this Brief, supra.

12. For a survey of the rights which have been granted the unborn by the Courts, see 3 S. L. R. 225, "Abortion, the Law and Defective Children: A Legal-Medical Study", Suffolk University Law Review (Vol. III, Spring 1969, pp. 225-276).

only born "persons", then all unborn persons who have vested property rights (subject to divestiture if they are not born alive)[13] would have no protection against an arbitrary taking of such property rights by the Federal Government. This would leave an absurd gap in the scope of constitutional protection of individual rights. The unborn person would have legal protection against everyone except the State.

If the unborn offspring of human parents is a "person" within the meaning of the 5th Amendment for the purpose of protecting its property interests against arbitrary action by the government, it must follow that the life of that "person" is also protected against arbitrary interference by the State.

13. In many states the unborn's intestate rights of succession to property vest immediately upon the death of the decedent subject to divestment if the child is not born alive. e.g., See Tomlin v. Laws, 301 Ill. 616, 134 N. E. 24 (1922); Deal v. Septon, 144 N. C. 110, 56 S. E. 691 (1907).

CONCLUSION.

It is respectfully submitted that the unborn is a "person" within the meaning of the 5th and 14th Amendments. Consequently, the unborn's life can be taken only with due process of law, and its life is entitled, like all other persons' lives, to equal protection under the law.

The voidance of state abortion statutes by court or legislature is governmental action which deprives the innocent unborn of the right to life, and therefore deprives them of equal protection and due process. This Court should therefore protect the unborn's constitutional rights in any decision it renders.

1967 respectively. Sweden's maternal mortality in 1966 was 11.3/100,000. Yugoslavia's 1966 rate was 105.3/100,000, and Hungary's was 48.4/100,000. In comparison, the U. S. maternal mortality in 1966 was 21.9/100,000 and 28.0/100,000 in 1967.

109. VITAL STATISTICS OF THE UNITED STATES, Part II—Mortality, pub. by the U. S. Public Health Serv. of H. E. W. The Official Vital Statistics list 160 maternal deaths from abortions of all causes. This is a figure hotly disputed by pro-abortionists who at times have placed the number of annual maternal deaths from illegal abortions at anywhere from 500 to 10,000 depending upon their audience. It is this kind of exaggeration that has helped the pro-abortionists create an hysteria for change in the abortion debate. However, it is interesting to note that one of the proponents of induced abortion, when discussing the same statistics at a recent pro-abortion conference, had this to say:

> "I might say we have a fairly high rate of discovery in New York City. The opportunity of obscuring an abortion death is very unlikely. We have a very effective Health Department, which screens all the death certificates, and anything unusual would be referred to us, particularly in a woman of childbearing age." STATEMENT OF THE CASE	1
JURISDICTION	15
A. A SUBSTANTIAL FEDERAL QUESTION HAS BEEN PRESENTED	15
B. THIS CASE IS NOT A "CASE" OR "CONTROVERSY" WITHIN THE MEANING OF ARTICLE III OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION	18
1. The refusal of the trial court to allow Appellees' inquiries into the identity of "Mary Doe" negates its jurisdiction to consider the case.	18
2. The remaining Appellees lack standing to challenge the statute.	19
C. A THREE-JUDGE DISTRICT COURT WAS NOT PROPERLY CONVENED	22
D. CONCLUSION AS TO JURISDICTION	28
ARGUMENT	29
A. THE CASE MAY NOT PROPERLY PROCEED AS A CLASS ACTION . .	29

B. APPELLANTS' ARGUMENT IS STRUCTURED ON A PREMISE WHICH THE LOWER COURT REFUSED TO ACCEPT AND WHICH IS UNTENABLE HERE 33

C. GEORGIA HAS LONG MAINTAINED A PUBLIC POLICY OF RECOGNIZING THAT AN UNBORN CHILD HAS PROTECTIBLE INTERESTS 41

1. The real meaning of the criminal abortion law invalidates both the premise of the court below and Appellants' premise. 41

2. The origin and history of Georgia's abortion laws signify their fetal-life-directed purpose. 43

3. Other manifestations of state concern for the unborn child . . . 63

D. THE ABORTION LAW MANIFESTS A LEGITIMATE BALANCING OF COMPETING RIGHTS AND INTERESTS 66

E. APPELLANTS' CLAIMS IN THIS COURT SHOULD BE DISMISSED. 69

1. The standard remaining is not vague 71

2. On the face of the statute, due process is not denied the abortion-seeking woman. . . . 73

3. The residency requirement is not an unconstitutional limitation 75

4. None of the claims asserted are here cognizable. 76

BRIEF FOR APPELLEES

STATEMENT OF THE CASE [1]

[1] The statement is placed out of order because the discussion of jurisdiction, which next follows, is dependent in part upon its content.

Suit challenging the entire criminal abortion law of Georgia (Criminal Code of Georgia, Title 26, Chapter 12), was brought in federal district court by twenty-six entities. No facts were established in the proceedings as to any of them. The group included "Mary Doe", purportedly a pregnant woman who had sought and been refused an abortion, nine persons described as physicians, seven as nurses, five as ministers, two as social workers, and two corporations. (A. 7-10).

"Mary Doe's" identity remains unknown except apparently to her attorney and possibly to plaintiff Bourne. (A. 63, 65). If the facts which she alleged had been proved, and assuming that no other significant but absent fact would alter the picture, her situation, by her own assertion, would be as follows:

At the time suit was instituted on April 16, 1970, (A. 1), "Mary Doe" was nine weeks pregnant with her fourth child. (A. 7-18). This was later thought instead to be thirteen to fourteen weeks, (A. 48), but the statement in this Court is that she was approximately eleven weeks pregnant at the time. (Appellant's Brief, p. 8).

She applied to Grady Memorial Hospital's abortion committee for approval of an abortion on March 25, 1970 (A. 8), that is, when she was by her calculations between six and eight weeks pregnant (measured from January 29 or February 12). She had first gone to Grady on about March 15 or 16, when she was thus four-and-one-half to six-and-one-half weeks pregnant, and had seen two doctors, White and Butler. Their conclusions concerning abortion for "Mary Doe" are unknown, and they are not parties to this suit. (A. 63). Whether a third doctor was seen or consulted before application to the abortion committee was made, as required by Section 26-1202(3), does not appear; "Mary Doe" thought three certifications were filed. (A. 56, Interrogatory 9, and A. 64, answer to Interrogatory No. 9).

The application was denied by the committee on April 10, 1970, sixteen days later. (A. 8, 64). 2/ The basis given for the denial, she claims, was that she did not come within the exception of Section 26-1202(a)(1), i.e., where an abortion is necessary because "a continuation of the pregnancy would endanger [her] life . . . or would seriously and permanently injure her health. . . ." (A. 8, 18, 2). Six days thereafter, suit was filed, claiming the hospital abortion committee's denial of her application deprived her of constitutionally protected rights. (A. 1, 8).

2/ Her Brief erroneously states it as twenty-five days (p. 8), which fact is notable because the "delay" is given as a basis for the complaint that the statutory procedure is time-consuming. (p. 36).

Apparently after suit was brought, but before the hearing below on June 15, 1970, (A. 125), "Mary Doe" was examined by two other doctors, Block and Bourn, and she applied to Georgia Baptist Hospital, which presumably by its abortion committee, approved the application on May 5, 1970. (A. 63-64). 3/ Whether "Mary Doe's" baby was subsequently aborted pursuant to this approval, or whether instead it was born in October 1970, because of the financial barrier at Georgia Baptist Hospital (A. 64), is not known to Appellees. Appellants indicate that an abortion was not done at the private hospital or outside of Georgia. (Appellants' Brief, p. 9).

3/ Thus the statement in Appellants' Brief that Dr. Bourne, one of the Appellants, was one of the doctors who proposed the abortion denied by Grady, appears to be mistaken. He is the only Appellee who is asserted to have any connection whatsoever with "Mary Doe".

"Mary Doe" was separated from her husband at the time of her application to Grady Hospital in March, 1970, (A. 64), 4/ as reconciled in April when suit was filed (A. 7), but as separated again in mid-June at the time of the court hearing. (A. 63). Whether the mental health problem she asserted (A. 7) was related in any way to the denial of her application, particularly since there was apparently no consent from her husband (A. 56, Interrogatory 8, and A. 64, answer to Interrogatory No. 8), is not in the record.

4/ Although she claimed she was "abandoned" then (A. 7) and during pendency of the suit. (Appellants' Brief, p. 8).

She alleged in addition that she was a young indigent resident of Georgia 5/, was unable to care for her other three children, who were in foster or adopted homes, would be unable to care for the product of her pregnancy (A. 7), and according to her Brief in this Court, she was unemployed. (Appellants' Brief, p. 8). Nowhere is it stated in the complaint that she personally desired an abortion of the baby 6/; the facts asserted allow the conclusion that she thought she ought to submit to an abortion procedure.

"Mary Doe" brought the suit additionally as a class action (A. 6). The class which she volunteered to represent was variously described for her as: "women desiring abortions" (A. 6, line 2), "all others similarly situated" to her (A. 8 ¶ 9); by the court below as "pregnant women, single or married, wishing legal abortions" (A. 71), and "pregnant women denied abortions because of the Georgia statute attacked" (A. 162).

5/ To qualify for aid at Grady Hospital, she would have to be a resident of either Fulton or DeKalb Counties.

6/ But see A. 18(b).

The remaining Appellants, who were dismissed below because of lack of a justiciable controversy between them and Appellees (A. 80), here challenge that ruling. (Appellants' Brief, p. 7). As indicated earlier, none of them are related in any way to "Mary Doe" except perhaps Dr. Bourne, whose conclusion regarding abortion was apparently affirmative and was approved by the private hospital's committee. (A. 63-64). None of them present any concrete, actual situation in which their "rights", differing as they are (since the group contains both individuals and corporations, medical, social and religious personages), were or will be denied. Their attack is a general attack on the statute in all of its aspects.

Neither as a group nor as individuals do they allege any prosecution or threat thereof or arrest or harassment or collision or conflict with anyone involved in enforcement or application of the statute.

None of the physicians allege a single instance in which any of them desire to perform an abortion or counsel a woman in connection therewith, or were prohibited in any way from doing so, even by the mere existence of the law. Three of the physicians (Hatcher, Waters, and Long) are on the medical staff at Grady Hospital, in at least abortion-related services. Whether they or any of them were involved in any way in "Mary Doe's" case at that hospital is not known.

None of the psychiatrists (Bourne, Turner, Leader, and Biggers) allege a single instance in which their statutory privileged communication was or might be encroached. 7/ Whether those listed as psychiatrists are eligible to perform abortion procedures is at the least doubtful, and in this regard, none of the physicians are allegedly licensed to perform abortive procedures. Other than the psychiatrists and various medical program directors, only two (James and Violin) are listed as "physicians".

None of the nurses allege a single instance of abortion which they were prohibited from assisting in or a single instance in which any of them were prohibited or dissuaded from counseling pregnant women about abortion.

None of the five ministers cites a single case in which they received or expected criminal action, nor do they explain why they might not be protected by the privileged communication statute.8/

8/ Ga. Code Ann. § 38-419.1. "Every communication made by any person professing religious faith, or seeking spiritual comfort, to any . . . minister, . . . priest, . . . or rabbi, . . . by whatever name called, shall be deemed privileged. No such minister, priest, or rabbi shall disclose any communications made to him by

The social workers, too, state no positive case. The corporations advance no adversary claim whatsoever.

Moving to Appellees, it is obvious that "Mary Doe"'s real complaint was against the Grady Hospital abortion committee, which did not approve her application. She thought her case came within the exception provided in Section 26-1202(1)(a) and so, apparently, did her physician and two consultants, and those involved in the approved Georgia Baptist Hospital application. The details and explanations of the action by the Grady committee, not being party to the suit, is not illumined in the record. It may have misinterpreted the statutory exception or been completely unaware of the total health picture of "Mary Doe" in terms of her mental and physical and medical factors, even to the extent set out in her complaint below. Thus, as portrayed by the comany such person professing religious faith, or seeking spiritual guidance, or be competent or compellable to testify with reference to any such communication in any court."

plaint, the denial of approval may well have been contrary to the statute's direction.

The suit instead was directed at the Attorney General of Georgia, the District Attorney of Fulton County (in which Grady Hospital is located), and the Chief of Police of Atlanta. No factual collision appeared between any of Appellants and any of Appellees. No suits, threats, harassments, or arrests were indicated.

Despite the Attorney General's advice that he was not a proper party (A. 41-46), the court below "sufficiently connected" him with the complaint by referring to his general duties, although none of them would involve him directly in enforcing the statute attacked. The remote possibility that the Governor would call on him to prosecute an abortion case is highly theoretical. (A. 73).

Appellants erroneously "link" the Attorney General with the Grady Hospital abortion committee. (Appellants' Brief, pp. 11, 21). No such control exists. The statute relied on by Appellants as the basis for the "link" provides that the authority of the Department of Law, of which the Attorney General is head, shall extend to "the executive branch of the Government and every department, office, institution, commission, committee, board or other agency thereof."[9] This authority does not extend to any committee or employee of Grady Hospital, which is locally controlled and funded and in no way operated by the State. The hospital, like other non-State hospitals, is not represented by the Attorney General in legal affairs.[10]

The court below referred to the Attorney General's opinions, in finding a "sufficient connection", and presumably a collision of interests. Even the published opinions, however, have no effect as law. An explanation of "opinions" is set out in Appendix A hereto. No official opinion on the currently attacked abortion law has been requested, as to any of its aspects.

The "collision" is therefore illusory, not only with respect to the local district attorney and the local chief of police, but also as to the State attorney general.

Thus the case stands. The facts are all hypothetical. The court below assumed jurisdiction without first ascertaining that a justiciable controversy existed in fact between any of Appellants and any of Appellees. The "controversy" was tenuous and remote at best. Having assumed that a controversy would exist between some of the present parties, or other parties, at some time, the court went on with no development of clear facts and simply seized the opportunity to look at the cold statute in a two-dimemsional manner. It was unenlightened by any involvement of the statute in a specific case or by the facts which investigation and cross-examination of witnesses, as well as scrutiny of legislative history, would bring to bear.

Looking at the statute at first blush, then, the court declared those parts of it which it could not justify, in its limited inquiry, to be unmaintainable. The statute was viewed not in context but standing alone, apart from its place in the body of the criminal law and its place in time, apart from any tested application. Then, having ignored an inquiry into its purposes and intents, the court fashioned its own explanation and superimposed it on the statute. The result was a rewritten statute with the court's goals, assumed to be the legislature's goals, aimed at.

The case stands no more concretely now than if Appellants' counsel had been permitted to draw a contrived, imagined situation, and then to litigate it. It is submitted that even a facial attack on State legislation may not thus proceed in our adversary system.

JURISDICTION

If a three-judge federal district court were properly convened, this Court's jurisdiction to review its decision is unquestioned. The jurisdictional issues raised relate first to the question of whether or not a district court had jurisdiction to consider the matter, and secondly, whether or not a three-judge court was properly convened.

A. A SUBSTANTIAL FEDERAL QUESTION HAS BEEN PRESENTED.

The fundamental issue raised in a recent rash of challenges to state abortion laws is whether or not the State, through its police power, has a legitimate interest in restricting the availability of abortions. Corrolary questions are whether or not a distinction should be made between married or unmarried females; whether or not the fetus is quick; and whether or not the State has an assertible interest in the quality of the abortion to be performed.

Based on their interpretations of Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1956), a number of courts, including the one below in the case sub judice, have determined that a woman's constitutional "right to privacy", encompasses a "right" to terminate a pregnancy by having the fetal development medically aborted, at least where the fetus is not yet quick. California v. Belous, 71 Cal.2d 954, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. den. 397 U.S. 915 (1970); Roe v. Wade, 314 F.Supp. 1217 (N.D. Tex., 1970), jurisdiction postponed, 402 U.S.941(No. 70-18, 1971 Term); State v. Jamieson, 480 P.2d 87 (Kan. 1971); Doe v. Scott, 321 F.Supp. 1385 (N.D. Ill. 1971); Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D. Wisc. 1970), appeal dismissed 400 U.S. 1 (1970).

In brief, these decisions have been bottomed on a determination that either the state had no legally protectible interest in perpetuating the life of the unquick (or quick) fetus, or that such interest, if it existed, was inferior to that of the pregnant woman's right to terminate her pregnancy by a medical abortion. Thus, these cases provide that, insofar as a State statute attempts to regulate the reasons for which an abortion may be had, it is void for overbreadth.

These decisions do recognize that the State does have a legally protectible interest in the quality of the abortion to be performed. See the opinion below, Doe v. Bolton, 319 F.Supp. 1048, 1055-56 (1970); United States v. Vuitch, 305 F.Supp. 1032 at 1034 (D. D.C. 1971), reversed on other grounds, 402 U.S. 62 (1971); Babbitz v. McCann, supra, 310 F.Supp. at 302.

Contrary to the above decisions, other courts have determined that the State has a legally protected interest in perpetuating a fetus' life. See Corkey v. Edwards, 322 F.Supp. 1248 (W.D. N.C. 1971); Steinberg v. Brown, 321 F.Supp. 741 (N.D. Ohio 1970); Rosen v. Louisiana, 318 F.Supp. 1217 (E.D. La. 1970). Additionally, although a federal district court determined that the federal statute of local application in the District of Columbia was void for vagueness insofar as it limited a physician's right to perform an abortion only where such action was necessary for the preservation of the woman's life or health, this Court reversed, but the decision appears to be limited to the question of whether or not the statute was void for vagueness, as it related to a married couple. United States v. Vuitch, supra, 402 U.S. 62, 70-71 (1971). Compare this with Wade v. Buchanan, 308 F.Supp. 729 (1970) judgment vacated, 401 U.S. 989 (1971).

In view of the foregoing, it seems that a substantial federal question has been presented.

B. THIS CASE IS NOT A "CASE" OR "CONTROVERSY" WITHIN THE MEANING OF ARTICLE III OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

Notwithstanding the existence of a federal question, a United States court cannot render advisory opinions. There must be an actual "case" or "controversy" between the parties. In determining this issue, consideration is to be given to such questions as "standing" and "ripeness".

1. The refusal of the trial court to allow Appellees' inquiries into the identity of "Mary Doe" negates its jurisdiction to consider the case.

While a pregnant female may have "standing" to challenge the constitutionality of the Georgia criminal abortion statute, when she has been denied an abortion because of it, there existed below, and there still exists, a real issue as to the actual existence of "Mary Doe." Whether she was actually pregnant, and whether she had been refused a medical abortion because of a proper application of the statute, were among the crucial factors never determined. Appellees' attempts to discover the same were disallowed by the trial court, although Rule 26, F.R.C.P. specifically grant to respondents the right to discover such information.

In the present posture of the record, therefore, "Mary Doe" is merely a fictitious person. Thus, at the threshhold of this litigation, there is no actual controversy between Appellees and "Mary Doe". Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 108 (1969); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961); United Public Workers of America v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947); Bailey v. Patterson, 369 U.S. 31 (1962).

2. The remaining Appellees lack standing to challenge the statute.

The trial court recognized that in Poe v. Ullman, supra, this Court held that the mere existence of a State penal statute would constitute insufficient grounds to support federal jurisdiction, and that, absent a pending or threatened prosecution, no federal jurisdiction exists sufficient to support a federal declaratory judgment on the constitution-ality of a state statute. However, the court further stated that this rule of jurisdiction was altered by Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968). But in that case, there were at least definable facts and a real conflict between what the teacher was prohibited from teaching and the content of the book she was instructed to use. Moreover, the school officials who created the conflict were parties to the suit and the State admitted that teaching the existence of the condemned theory would itself be grounds for dismissal and prosecution under the statute. Such a palpable clash does not exist here.

In spite of this, the court below held that because "Mary Doe" had been refused an abortion under the statute, an actual controversy between her and Appellees existed, but that since no action had been taken or even threatened against the remaining appellants, no actual controversy existed between them and Appellees. Insofar as this determination relates to Appellants other than "Mary Doe", the result reached by the court was correct. Brooks v. Briley, 274 F.Supp. 538 (M.D. Tenn. 1967), affirmed per curiam 391 U.S. 361 (1968). See Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971); Boyle v. Landry, 401 U.S. 77 (1971).

Where the only plaintiff allegedly having standing by virtue of an actual controversy with defendants was not shown to exist in fact, no jurisdiction to consider the complaint lies. Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346 (1910).

Summarizing, there was no "live dispute between [any of] the [adversary] parties." Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486, 517-518 (1969). There was missing the necessary ingredient of "a substantial controversy between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment." Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pacific Coal and Oil Co., 312 U.S. 270, 273 (1941).

Thus, there being no pending prosecutions at the time of the three-judge hearing (or at any time throughout these proceedings, for that matter), a declaratory judgment was improper. See Perez v. Ledesma, 401 U.S. 82, 86n.2(1971).

C. A THREE JUDGE DISTRICT COURT WAS NOT PROPERLY CONVENED.

The three-judge court took a broad and expansive view of its jurisdiction, which is in apparent conflict with the constrictive view this Court has repeatedly taken. Swift & Co. v. Wickham, 382 U.S. 111 (1965); Ex parte Collins, 277 U.S. 565 (1928); Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. v. Oklahoma Packing Company, 292 U.S. 386 (1934); Rorick v. Board of Commissioners, 307 U.S. 208 (1939); Phillips v. U. S., 312 U.S. 246 (1940). The Court has been reluctant to extend the range of cases necessitating the convening of three-judge courts. Allen v. Board of Education, 393 U.S. 544, 562 (1969).

Several of the prerequisites for a three-judge court's proper convention were not present in this case. One of the jurisdictional prerequisites to the applicability of Section 2281 is a request for injunctive relief against the enforcement of a state statute. The request in this case was mere verbiage, and as has been shown, the fact of the complaint is devoid of any allegation of prosecution or threatened prosecution under the challenged statute by any Appellee against anyone. There was, simply, nothing to enjoin. "Mary Doe" had purportedly been denied an abortion by a hospital committee because of the existence of the law. The hospital was not a party to the suit. The committee members were not parties to the suit. Neither the Attorney General, the District Attorney, nor the Chief of Police had in any way restricted, or threatened any action against any of the Appellants. No enforcement or execution of the criminal statute had been instigated or intimated by any of the Appellees, nor was there any allegation suggesting that this was so. As far as permanent injunctive relief was concerned, only a general request for an injunction against enforcing, threatening to enforce, or applying the statute, was sought. But the complaint was devoid of any alleged action or activity which, if proved existent, would be subject to injunction. An injunction must enjoin someone from doing something he is doing or is about to do. That prerequisite was entirely absent here and the plaintiff's prayer for injunctive relief was only nominally asserted in an effort to invoke three-judge jurisdiction.

The validity of this analysis is further reinforced by an examination, in the context of this case, of the directions for the form and scope of a federal injunction. In Rule 65(d),

Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, it is specifically delineated that:

> "Every order granting an injunction and every restraining order shall set forth the reasons for its issuance; shall be specific in terms; shall describe in reasonable detail and not by reference to the complaint or other document, the act or acts sought to be restrained; and is binding only upon the parties to the action, their officers, agents, servants, employees, and attorneys, and upon those persons in active concert or association with them who receive actual notice of the order by personal service or otherwise."

The complaint asks that the Attorney General, the District Attorney of Fulton County, the Chief of Police of the City of Atlanta, and "their agents and successors" be enjoined and restrained "from enforcing, threatening to enforce, or otherwise applying the challenged statute in derogation of the rights of plaintiffs".(A. 15). But what act or acts of any of these defendants are sought to be restrained? No act or impending act by any Appellee is even alleged in the complaint. What "specific terms" could possibly be framed which would not refer totally to only presumed future conduct of any of the Appellees? An unsupported forecast could be the only source of such an injunction. In short, the prima facie basis for the extraordinary equitable remedy of injunction against enforcement of a state statute was missing. See Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 155-156 (1908).

The gist of the complaint was an attack on the constitutionality of the statute adopted in 1968 and which has not yet been construed or considered by the State courts. Although declaratory judgment may be granted as an additional remedy in three-judge injunction suits, the authorizing statute does not give any new or wider jurisdiction with it. Western Casualty and Surety Company v. Herman, 405 F.2d 121 (8th Cir. 1968); Stanley v. Avery, 387 F.2d 637 (6th Cir. 1968); cert. den. 390 U.S. 1044; Bourazak v. North River Insurance Company, 379 F.2d 530 (7th Cir. 1967). Consequently, if a complaint fails to state a claim for injunction, as here, a three-judge court would have no other jurisdiction upon which to base a declaratory judgment. The court in this case recognized, from the pleadings and without any evidence, that no injunction could lie. It summarily dismissed the request, stating that "the instant case does not involve granting injunctive relief." (A. 80, emphasis added). Where it has been held that declaratory judgment could be granted and an injunction withheld, it is submitted that this is only when the complaint states a cause for injunction but for some reason within the court's discretion, such as for the sake of federal abstention, relief is denied. Powell v. McCormack, 346 U.S. 486 (1969); Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241 (1967).

Here, the underlying basis for three-judge jurisdiction, that is, a bona fide request for injunction, is lacking. Therefore, the ancillary relief cannot properly be granted because the foundation is missing. The mere recitation of a jurisdictional prerequisite does not supply it, particularly when couched in such broad and general terms as are evident in the complaint in this case. The lip-service given the injunctive aspects of the case clearly indicate that it was no more than a vehicle to justify a three-judge court. The court itself gave short shrift to that aspect of the case, denying the injunction summarily. A three-judge court is only necessary where an injunctive decree "may issue" on the ground of federal unconstitutionality of the state statute. Florida

Lime and Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Jacobsen, 362 U.S. 73 (1960). The complaint must at least formally allege a basis for the equitable relief of injunction. Idlewild Bon Voyage Liquor Corp. v. Epstein, 370 U.S. 713 (1962). That criteria was not present in this case.

Thus, the question is whether, in the absence of a request of some substance for injunctive relief, a three-judge court is properly convened:

> ". . . the requirement that the action seek to enjoin a state officer cannot be circumvented by joining, as nominal parties defendant, state officers whose action is not the effective means of the enforcement or execution of the challenged statute.' Wilentz v. Sovereign Camp, 306 U.S. 573, 579-580, . . ." Moody v. Flowers, 387 U.S. 97, 102 (1967).

It therefore follows that a nominal request for injunction against three defendants whose action was not the effective means of enforcement of the statute, cannot provide the prerequisite base for a three-judge court to examine the constitutionality of a state statute.

Likewise, the absence of any real involvement of the grant or denial of injunctive relief below adversely affects the jurisdiction of this Court in the attempted direct appeal. Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U.S. 427 (1970).

CONCLUSION AS TO JURISDICTION

The case below did not present a situation over which federal jurisdiction might vest in order to authorize the court to hear and determine the case. Secondly, a three-judge court was not properly convened. Accordingly, the case at this juncture requires only reversal of the opinion and judgment below, or remand for dismissal of the complaint.

ARGUMENT

A. THE CASE MAY NOT PROPERLY PROCEED AS A CLASS ACTION.

Before proceeding further with the merits of the substantive issues sought to be litigated, the outline of the case must be further defined so that its context is clear.

The suit was brought as a class action under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (A. 6), with the plaintiffs claiming to represent at least six sub-classes: women represented by "Mary Doe", physicians, psychiatrists, nurses, ministers and social workers. (A. 13). The use of this unwieldy group of plaintiffs for important constitutional litigation was never justified by the plaintiffs or discussed by the court below. In the complaint (A. 6, paragraph 5), plaintiffs alleged that a class action is proper without even specifying which form of class action was appropriate to the circumstances. Rule 23 provides three clearly delineated alternatives. Rule 23(b)(1), (2), and (3). Nor did plaintiffs state facts to meet the prerequisites set forth in Rule 23(a).

The most serious defect resulting from this approach is that the class which "Mary Doe" claimed to represent was described in ambulatory terms which changed its complexion at various times.[11] Different issues arise according to the limits of the definition of the class. For example, "Mary Doe" claims to be married (A. 7). Does she therefore represent married women only? What effect, then, does the declaratory judgment have on unmarried women? Further, "Mary Doe" alleges she is poor (A. 7) Does her class contain only those who cannot afford an abortion at a private hospital? "Mary Doe" is allegedly a resident of Georgia (A. 7). Could she represent non-residents wanting an abortion in Georgia? The court made no findings on these important questions.

Rule 23(c)(3) requires the court to ". . . describe those whom the court finds to be members of the class." There was no such description in either the opinion or judgment of the district court even though that court considered it proper to examine the entire Georgia abortion statute. The class action is a method for adjudication, not a procedure allowing advisory opinions. Without a limitation and description of the class, the case is necessarily filled with numerous issues which are merely amorphous and hypothetical. A description of the class is absolutely necessary because a judgment is effective only on those found to be members. (Rule 23[c] [3], F.R.C.P.) The effect of the judgment is unpredictable and incalculable unless the court has specified those whose rights have been adjudicated.

The use of the class action mechanism for the five groups of professionals raises less serious problems since the trial court correctly dismissed them for lack of a justiciable controversy. However, the propriety of a class representation is again questionable. These groups sued on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated (A. 7-9), again without stating who such people would be. Certainly they could not represent all members of their respective professions because not all would share their views and interests. Contrary to Rule 23(a), the class action would be improper because (a) there are not common questions of law or fact; (b) the claims are not representative; and (c) a representative party may not adequately represent the interests of the class.

If they wish to represent smaller groups within the ranks of their professions, such groups must be described. The claims of the doctors, nurses, ministers, and social workers, then, are doubly hypothetical. Not only is there no justiciable issue involving them, there is no identifiable group whose rights could be determined in the context of this litigation.

These additional Appellants, who were dismissed and now seek relief therefrom, are in no different position than any other persons in the same professions who might assert a generally described disagreement with the statute in a blanket claim that it infringes on their rights. Such a superficial antagonism does not make a case for the determination of constitutional issues. Hard fact gives way to surmise and conjecture in such circumstances. Precision is totally lacking.

Having thus arrived in this Court, Appellants seek a further condemnation of the entire statutory scheme, claiming facial unconstitutionality with respect to every aspect of the criminal abortion law. Not only is its application to "Mary Doe" challenged, but also its application to her undefined class, and to the tag-along Appellants and the "classes" they represent. On top of this, Appellants again seek injunctive relief.

Putting aside for the moment the gateway jurisdictional issue and the roads-end injunction issue, the merits of the case simply call for a determination of whether the Georgia criminal abortion statute, part and parcel, is contrary on its face to the mandates of the federal constitution.

B. APPELLANTS' ARGUMENT IS STRUCTURED ON A PREMISE WHICH THE LOWER COURT REFUSED TO ACCEPT AND WHICH IS UNTENABLE HERE.

The propositions of the appeal are all moored to a single claim. Though variously expressed, and divergently relief on in attacking the parts of the statutory scheme, the mooring of the challenge is the belief that any woman has a fundamental right, constitutionally protected, to independently determine that a child which she has conceived shall not be brought to birth, and to procure an abortion of its development. (A. 12-13). Although Appellants seem to agree with the court's bounded recognition of such a right (Appellants' Brief, p. 22) and purport to go on from there (i.e., Arguments "B" through "F") 12/ this is not really the case. Appellants dispute the limitations on the right which the court pronounced, both expressly and by the whole tenor of their argument.

The specific expressions are illustrated by the repeated references to "the right to terminate an unwanted pregnancy". (Appellants' Brief, e.g., pp. 12, 23, 24, 27, 42). This is far different from what the court formulated as a right to a "necessary" abortion. (A. 84-85, see statute as revised by court, Appellants' Brief, pp. 3-7). Mere desire or convenience was specifically rejected by the court as a parameter of the right (A. 81), but Appellants speak assumingly of the "right to abortion". (Appellants' Brief, pp. 14, 16).

Secondly, Appellants seek the invalidation or the total annihilation of the statute, the result of which would be to cast abortion into the pot with any other medical procedure, whether it be the removal of a tooth or appendix or any other part of a person's body. Appellants admit of no distinction and indeed tout the availability of simple, safe abortion techniques which purportedly need not even be done in a hospital. (Appellants' Brief, pp. 38-40). The procedural controls on abortion, Appellants say,". . . remain as a barrier to the constitutional rights asserted and will obstruct and interfere with such rights. . . ." (Appellants' Brief, p. 10).

Though the proffered basis for challenging the court below's standard of "necessary in the best clinical judgment" of the physician involved, is that such a standard is vague, a reading of the entire brief reveals that Appellants' simple aim is the removal of all state-imposed standards and controls on abortions, vague or not. In pursuit of this end, Appellants argue that there is no legitimate compelling state interest which might justify a limitation on this "right". (Appellants' Brief, p. 24-27). They argue further that the urgencies of time and economic poverty and the panoply of modern methods, all pragmatically speak against control. (Appellants' Brief, pp. 35-42). Finally they argue as to the medical personnel represented, that their right to practice their professions are curtailed because they are not permitted to recommend or perform an abortion which they determine is "the correct [not even "necessary"] medical treatment." (Appellants' Brief, pp. 44-45). Cast in that light, it is beyond doubt that the mooring which Appellants urge the Court to catch onto is an unrestricted right to abortion in every case where a woman "wants" one and her physician considers it "advisable".

Pains have been taken to point out this underlying thread not only because of its obscurity, particularly initially, but also because of the weakness it lends the arguments advanced. Remove it as a premise, and the individual claims become a house of cards.

Hypothesize for a moment a real acceptance of the core of the holding below insofar as it related to the fashioning of a right, keeping in mind that Appellants outwardly profess agreement. (Appellants' Brief, p. 22). The court established that the formation of an embryo, "a potential human life", as it called it, granted the State a legitimate area of control over the termination of that life before its birth. (A. 82). With that as a premise, the court measured the State's controls and found them maintainable insofar as they reasonably restricted the quality of the decision to terminate that life and the manner of execution of that decision. (A. 84).

If Appellants truly agreed with the court's premise, they would not be able to argue that the State has no interest in the fetus, because the argument thereby denies the premise. Nor would they be able to argue that the procedure requiring consultants and hospital committee approval is unconstitutionally "cumbersome, time-consuming, and restrictive". (Appellants' Brief, pp. 31-42). They see it simply as an irrational restraint on a desired medical service, completely ignoring and discounting the potential human life whose existence must be weighed in the balance. Nor would they be able to argue that physicians are, by the court-revised statute, denied the right to practice medicine "in accordance with their best professional judgment." (Appellants' Brief, p. 44). What this means, they say, is that they should be loosed from the statute's restraints so that they could recommend or perform fetal abortions whenever they felt it is "a correct medical treatment" or "medically advisable." (Appellants' Brief, pp. 44-46). They say they should be as free to make this judgment as they are to make any other decision regarding a medical procedure. (Appellants' Brief, p. 46).

This latter position perhaps most graphically portrays the departure of Appellants from the premise established below. If that premise were truly accepted as "correct" (Appellants' Brief, p. 22), Appellant physicians would not totally ignore in their argument the fetus' presence as an additional factor to consider in making "their best professional judgment". The sanctions of the statute "deny the individual physician the right to give medical advice and to perform medical procedures based only on his concern for the health and life of his patient" they assert indignantly. (Appellants' Brief, p. 45). Such a statement is patently unconcerned with "the potential human life" and instead displays in bold relief the uncompromising assertion that the removal of an unwanted fetus is just as much a right as the removal of an unwanted mole.

Thus, we cannot be led into believing that the invalidation of the procedures, which Appellants urge this Court to pronounce, will leave intact the "correct" portion of the decision below. The profession of agreement deflects from the underlying thread and distorts the results which would materialize from acceptance of Appellants' arguments. Remove the procedures and restrictions on abortions set up carefully by the State, and the safeguards built to protect the "potential human life", which is already maturing, dissolve.

Thus, the issue which the Court has before it is extraordinarily fundamental. In order for Appellants to prevail in their request, their premise must be tested. The Court should not simply move from an acceptance of the lower court's premise to the assertions of the Appellants purportedly stemming from it, because Appellants' assertions grow out of a different and antagonistic root. Appellants' attack cannot be grafted onto the curtailable right established by the court below. It demands the proclamation of stronger, and even absolute, right in order to survive.

The pivotal question is whether whether a woman has a constitutionally protected right to procure a termination of fetal life developing within her with no more restriction by the State than is justifiable for other medical procedures. This question may be addressed despite the bareness of the record and the absence of particularized facts. It does not need a fully developed case involving an actual application or attempted enforcement of the criminal abortion law of Georgia. The scope of the issues reaches much beyond any individual case.

C. GEORGIA HAS LONG MAINTAINED A PUBLIC POLICY OF RECOGNIZING THAT AN UNBORN CHILD HAS PROTECTIBLE INTERESTS.

1. The real meaning of the criminal abortion law invalidates both the premise of the court below and Appellants' premise.

Appellants' multitudinous assertions in this Court must fail at the outset for the fundamental reason that they are based on the erroneous presumption that a woman has an unfettered constitutional right to an abortion if she desires one. This view denies and obliterates any interest or right which an unborn child may have, and which is protectible by the State as an exercise of its police power impelled by a justifiable public policy.

An understanding of their position reveals in bold relief the absolutism of their premise. The extremeness of their espousal denotes not only that Appellants disagree with the entire substantive holding below, even including the seemingly favorable ruling with regard to the woman's rights, but also that they must go far beyond the ruling below to launch an attack on the remainder of the statute.

The State does not agree with the seemingly moderate view taken by the lower court, and indeed sought an appeal therefrom in this Court. Bolton, etc., et al. v. Mary Doe, October Term, 1970, No. 973, dismissed for lack of jurisdiction, 402 U.S. 936 (1971); intermediate appeal pending in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, No. 71-1932. With that in mind, the gap between Appellants' far more absolute position and that maintained by the Appellees is recognizably wider.

But even if Appellants had accepted the holding of the lower court in this regard, the argument herein undermines the underlying premise and is applicable to a reconsideration of it. Thus, the claimed "right", whether considered curtailable, as the court below regarded it, or whether considered absolute, as claimed by Appellants, requires scrutiny by this Court in considering the appeal. This is so particularly because the claimed "right" is not an established, universally recognized one but has rather been newly enunciated by the decisions of some, but not all, of the lower courts which have had occasion to rule on the matter. (See lists of illustrative cases, collected in Appellants' Brief, pp. 23-24, footnote 2).

2. The origin and history of Georgia's abortion laws signify their fetal-life-directed purpose.

The State's concern for the entity known as the unborn human child is demonstrated not only by the abortions laws, but also throughout its history in other ways. These ways will be discussed in the next subsection. As to abortion, however, the prohibition did not begin with the statute of 1865-66, or 1876, as Appellants contend. (Appellants' Brief, pp. 24-25).

By the laws of Georgia of 1876, the legislature simply made abortion and feticide specific crimes under the Penal Code. Ga. Laws 1876, p. 113, Appendix "B" herein. Prior to that time, it is apparent that such crimes were prohibited in Georgia by virtue of the common law's incorporation into the body of Georgia's criminal law by statute. An Act passed on February 25, 1784, incorporated into Georgia law all the common laws and statutes of England which were in force and binding on the inhabitants of Georgia on May 14, 1776, except as otherwise altered by the Georgia legislature. Ga. Laws 1874, p. 404, reprinted at Prince's Digest, 310-311.

The comprehensive Code of Georgia of 1861 specifically carried forward this provision in its very first section. Ga. Laws 1860, p. 24; Code of Georgia of 1861, pp. 1-2.13/

13/ In 1953, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Georgia William S. Jenkins, then Chief Justice Emeritus, spoke on "The Common Law [in Georgia] and Its First Codification by Thomas R. R. Cobb", and the speech appears at 16 Ga. Bar Journal, No. 1, pp. 137-147. Therein he commented: "It is doubtful if the average educated citizen fully realizes that the common law of England together with the act of Parliament supplementing of modifying it, as it existed in 1776, is of force in Georgia today. It is the backlog of our jurisprudence, its most important part. It is in fact all the law we have as it may have been supplemented or modified by our Constitutions and statutes. But even then the courts always construe with great strictness, and in favor of the Common Law, any statute which it is claimed has modified it." Id. at 138.

The Constitution of the State of Georgia of 1865 also expressly adopted the common and statute law of England, of force in Georgia in 1860. Constitution of the State of Georgia, 1865, Art. V, Sec. I, Par. 5; Code of Georgia of 1867, p. 982-983. 14/

See also the general catchall provisions in the Code of 1873, Sections 4509 and 4529, pp. 814 and 181, regarding offenses against the public peace and tranquility and against public justice. These sections were discussed by the Supreme Court of Georgia in Prichard v. State, 160 Ga. 527 (1925), when they were, as misdemeanors, a part of the Penal Code of 1910, §§ 339 and 366:

> "These sections did not create new offenses unknown to the common law. They only adopted common-law crimes, and made > them Georgia crimes. So in Ormond v. Ball, 120 Ga. 916 (48 S.E. 383), this court held the first of these sections was sufficiently broad in its terms to authorize the punishment of any offense which at common law was an offense against public justice. These sections punished persons only for things which were offenses against public justice or against the public peace by the common law." Id. at 528-529.

14/ A discussion of the existence and force of the common law and statutes of England is contained in Reed, A Handbook of Georgia Criminal Law and Procedure, Macon, 1873, pp. 64-66.

Thus, there can be no doubt that if abortion was a crime in England in 1776, it was also a crime in Georgia, by incorporation, in that period prior to the particularation by statute enacted in 1876. 15/

15/ Reed presaged the adoption of the statute. In discussing murder and infanticide, supra, footnote 14/, at 178, he noted in 1873 that "our law should punish criminal abortion." This reference was to the need for a specific Georgia statute, because he also wrote: "In most of the cases, if not in all, the Courts would apply the rules of the common law to define

Now, what of the law of England with respect to abortion, upon which Georgia law depended prior to the statutes passed in 1876. Keeping in mind that the law in this respect which existed in England in 1776, was extant in Georgia, Blackstone's Commentaries, first published in 1765-1768, provide the key.

The subject of abortion is discussed by Blackstone in the context of the right of personal security. This is described as one of the three principal rights of mankind, protected to the people of England. 16 / The right of personal security was regarded by Blackstone as an absolute right, vested by the immutable laws of nature, and in that context, abortion was recognized by Blackstone thusly:

any such unenumerated offense. The old authorities, Coke, Hale, Hawkins, and expecially Blackstone - who is followed more than any other by the Penal Code - would be especially useful." Supra, footnote 14 /, p. 66.

16 / Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 129.

"I. The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health and his reputation.

"1. Life is the immediate gift of God, a right inherent by nature in every individual; and it begins in contemplation of law as soon as an infant is able to stir in the mother's womb. For if a woman is quick with child, and by a potion or otherwise, killeth it in her womb; or if anyone beat her, whereby the child dieth in her body, and she is delivered of a dead child; this, though not murder, was by the ancient law homicide or manslaughter.[17] But the modern law doth not look upon this offence in quite so atrocious a light, but merely as a heinous misdemeanor[citing 3 Inst. 50].

17/ The footnoted authority is Bracton 1.3, c.21, translated from Latin in Cooley's Blackstone, Volume I, p. 119: "If anyone (continued on next page)

"An infant in ventre sa mere, or in the mother's womb, is supposed in law to be born for many purposes. It is capable of having a legacy, or a surrender of a copyhold estate, made to it. It may have a guardian assigned to it; and it is enabled to have an estate limited to its use, and to take afterwards by such limitation, as if it were then actually born. 18/ And in this point the civil law agrees with ours." 19/ Blackstone's Commentaries, Volume I, Book I, pp. 129-130.

strikes a woman when pregnant, or administer poison to her by which abortion shall ensue, if a child shall be already formed, and particularly if it be alive, that person is guilty of manslaughter."

18/ Here Blackstone footnotes that "Every legitimate infant in ventre de sa mere is considered as born for all beneficial purposes. C9, Litt. 36, 1 P.Wm. 329.

Thus, the right to life was recognized in the law of England as being one of the most fundamental and natural rights which existed even without government, and the right extended at least to some extent to an unborn child.

Theearly English statutes, which made certain attempts to procure the miscarriage of any woman highly penal, and the acts up to 1868, are collected and discussed in Storer and Heard, Criminal Abortion: Its Nature, Its Evidence, and Its Law, Boston: Little Brown & Co., 1868, Book II, Chapter II. The earliest English statute cited is 43 Geo. III, ch. 58, which was passed in 1803. Known as Lord Ellenborough's Act, abortion of a quick child was punishable by death, and that of an unquick child was also a felony, and variously punishable, including transportation of up to fourteen years. Id. at 165-166. Thus, the highly penal regard given to abortion, which was evident at the time of Bracton, was reinstated. The common law of England in 1776 was thus at a point between Blackstone's description and the statute of 1803. 20/

Whatever may have been the English law in force in 1776, which the Georgia legislatures repeatedly incorporated into the State's body of criminal law, two things are clear. It cannot be doubted that criminal abortion was a part of the law of Georgia from its inception long before the statute of 1876, and secondly, the prohibition was based at least in part on a recognition of, and concern for, the life of the fetus. The proposition advanced by Appellants (Appellants' Brief, pp. 24-27), that the sole purpose of early abortion laws was the protection of the pregnant woman's life and health, is therefore unsound. The facts of history show a deeper and more fundamental concern with the rights of a protectible entity other than that of the mother.

20/ Storer and Heard, supra, also discussed many English cases involving various aspects of abortion, both at common law and under statute.

The accuracy of this position is further enhanced by reference to Bishop's New Criminal Law, wherein he described abortion as "one of the leading offenses against population, and therefore . . . indictable at the common law." Bishop's New Criminal Law, Vol. I (8th Edition, 1892), p. 312, citing Stat. Crimes, 6 744. See also the discussions concerning abortion at pp. 446-447, 195-196, 465-466, and 357-358.

The law's protection of human life by way of criminal sanction of varying degrees as respects particular points on the continuum of life is described by Bishop in the chapter on Feloneous Homicide, Specific Offenses. Abortion is listed as one of the "Dangerous misdemeanors":

> "If one to commit on a pregnant woman the dangerous misdemeanor of abortion, administers to her a drug or employs instruments in consequence whereof she dies, or the child is prematurely born and dies from the too early exposure to the external world, the homicide is murder." Id. at 394.

The underlying concern for the unborn child, rather than solely the life and health of the mother (if that were a concern at all) is further illustrated in the lengthy discussion on "abortion" in 1 Ruling Case Law, pp. 69-88.

It is with that background that the legislature enacted the first specific abortion statute in 1876. 21/, which statute the Georgia Supreme Court in 1920 noted "removed from the operation of the then existing penal laws of the State only such offenses as were clearly included within its own provisions." Summerlin v. State, 150 Ga. 173, 176 (1920). 22/

The law which provided the punishment of death or life imprisonment for foeticide and declared abortion of a quick child as assault with intent to murder, and provided misdemeanor punishment for abortion of an unquick fetus, demonstrates the State's recognition of the unborn fetus as a protectible human child.

21/ Ga. Laws 1876, p. 113, reproduced as Appendix "B" herein.

22/ The court went on to say in this case involving manslaughter of the mother: "It is unnecessary to discuss the common law on the subject of criminal abortion. This is a prosecution for the killing of a human being, [the mother], not the unborn, unquickened fetus." Id. at 176.

This is also clearly demonstrated y the decisions applying and construing the 1876 statute. Under an indictent for assault with intent to murder rought pursuant to Section 2 of the Act, he Supreme Court of Georgia held:

> "The word 'child' as used in section 81 of the Penal Code means a 'living child,' that is to say 'an unborn child so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick"' and which is still alive when the alleged unlawful means are employed to produce the miscarriage or abortion." Taylor v. State, 105 Ga. 846 (1898).

"Quick" was subsequently defined o mean "so far developed as to move r stir in the mother's womb." Sullivan . State, 121 Ga. 183, 187 (1904). he recognition of the unborn fetus as human child was unmistakably clear hen the court said in the companion ase of Barrow v. State, 121 Ga. 187, 88 (1904):

> "An intent to destroy an unborn child so far developed as to be ordinarily called 'quick' may exist without absolute knowledge > that such child is 'quick'. If defendant's purpose was to destroy the foetus, and in so doing he killed a child which was 'quick,' the criminal intent would extend to the consequences of his act. Powe v. State,(N.J.), 2 Atl. 662."

The purpose of the statute was primarily the protection of the fetus and its life, rather than the mother's interest, is drastically pointed out by the Barrow Court:

> "Neither the consent of the female to the abortion, nor a purpose to conceal her shame by an operation, will excuse the criminal act, and an instruction to this effect was not erroneous." Id. at 188.

The failure of the law to reach back to protect a child not yet "quick" may have been due more to a lack of understanding of embryology than to a callous denial that such a being was "a child". To sum it all up, the statement of the Supreme Court of Georgia in Passley v. State, 194 Ga. 327 (1942) is appropriate:

"It is evident that in enacting this statute [Ga. Laws 1876, p. 113], the legislature was undertaking to provide by penal law appropriate penalties for the destruction of an unborn child." Id. at 329. 23/

23/ For a further discussion of this first statute, see also Stubbs, Georgia Law of Children, 1969, §§ 167 - 170.

In 1968, the Georgia legislature modernized the nearly 100-year-old abortion statute, and it is that statute against which the broadside attack is launched by Appellants. There is no question that the legislature intended to retain it as a part of the criminal law in the State and did not intend to destroy its historical meaning and purposes by treating the termination of life of an unborn child as merely an effort "to treat the problem as a medical one", as the court below erroneously concluded. (A. 82). If that had been the intent, it undoubtedly would have been taken out of the criminal law and inserted instead into the public health portions of the statute. (Title 88). Moreover, and more substantively, the stringent safeguards and portions surrounding the taking of such life would probably not have been necessary.

The court below alluded to a peculiarity of consequence which may affect whatever law is actually in effect in Georgia when it footnoted in its judgment that:

> "It is the intention of this Court that our decision reach the codification of identical provisions of Georgia > Code Ann. § 26-9925a and corresponding provisions enumerated above if such codification has any force as law." (A. 88, fn. 1).

The underlying confusion has resulted because of a unique sequence of events. The 1876 Act was amended by an Act specifically and exclusively relating to the crimes of abortion, foeticide, and infanticide. (Ga. Laws 1968, p. 1432). The bill upon which that Act was based was first introduced in 1967. (1967 House Journal 338, House Bill No. 281). After much debate and consideration, including public hearings, the bill as altered was passed and sent to the Governor on March 6, 1968. The Governor did not attach his signature of approval, so that, by virtue of the Constitution of Georgia of 1945, Sec. 2-3015, the Act presumably became law 30 days after adjournment on March 8.

In the meantime, however, the Criminal Code Commission's proposed Code was sent to the legislature and, in the course of its deliberations, the latter revised the Commission's proposed sections on abortion so that they conformed substantially with House Bill No. 281, the independently proposed revision, as passed.

The Criminal Code of Georgia was approved by the Governor on April 10, 1968, but its effective date was July 1, 1969. (Ga. Laws 1968, pp. 1249, 1351). A comparison of the Criminal Code provisions (§§ 26-1201 - 26-1203) with the Act based on House Bill 281, (Ga. Laws 1968, p. 1432), reveals that they are not entirely identical. 24/

Thus, the desirability of requiring repair to the State courts first, for a ruling on what law is effective (or was effective when suit was brought below), before constitutional issues are debated, would be particularly in order in regard to this statute. The recent case of Gunn v. State, 227 Ga. 786 (1971) mentions but does not decide the question of effectiveness. That same question is now pending in State habeas corpus proceedings brought in Habersham County Superior Court, Georgia: Gunn v. Ballkcom, Civil Action No. 4022.

A study of legislative history is unfortunately not published in public records citable to this Court. It would require evidentiary development, or construction by a State court, to develop in detail the intentions of the legislature with respect to each aspect of the statute. That the overall intention was protection of the unborn child is manifested, however, by the history of the abortion laws in Georgia, which has been outlined above, and by an examination of the entire statutory scheme.

One exceedingly clear illustration of this is the unique feature providing for expeditious judicial determination of the constitutional or legal rights of a fetus sought to be destroyed. (Criminal Code of Georgia § 26-1202(c); Appellants' Brief, pp. 5-6. The court below, without explaining how such a guardian provision would impermissibly infringe the mother's rights, struck it in its entirety. (A. 85, 88). It is inconsistent with the court's recognition of "a potential human life" over which the State has "a legitimate area of control" (A. 82), to deprive the entity in which that life is reposed of the legal process to determine its protectibility. Whether or not that unborn child has a constitutional right to reach birth, the State's attempt to leave that question as well as others respecting the rights of a living fetus, open for judicial review, demonstrates its vital interest in fetal life.

The unsettled legal issue, for example, of whether an unborn child, at any age, is entitled to Fourteenth Amendment due process of law, before it is deprived of life, is embraced in the statutory scheme. It has been held that a human being has an inherent right to due process of law. Burns v. Lovett, 202 F.2d 335, 91 U.S. App. D.C. 208, aff'd, Burns v. Wilson, 346 U.S. 137, reh. den. 346 U.S. 844 (1953). That a child en ventre sa mere is regarded in law as a human being from the moment of conception, or from the time it can "stir", for at least some purposes, has been repeatedly stated. See, for example: Bonbrest v. Kotz, 65 F.Supp. 138 (D. D.C. 1946); Tucker v. Carmichael, 208 Ga. 201 (1951); Gleitman v. Cosgrove, 49 N.J. 22, 227 A.2d 689 (1967); Mitchell v. Common wealth, 39 Am.Rep. 227 (Ky. Ct. App. 1879); "In Defense of the Right to Live: The Constitutionality of Therapeutic Abortions," 1 Ga. Law Review 693 (Summer 1967); Quay, "Constitutionality of Abortion Laws: Rights of the Fetus," 8 Child and Family Quarterly, No. 2, p. 169. The purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment are not inapplicable. With respect thereto, this Court said in Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303 (1880):

> "[The Negro race's] training had left them mere children, and as such they needed the protection which a wise government extents to those who are unable to protect themselves." Id. at 306.

The analogy is complete when the words of the Supreme Court of Georgia are considered:

> "In . . . general, a child is to be considered as in being from the time of the conception, where it will be for the benefit of such child to be so considered." Morrow v. Scott, 7 Ga. 525, 537 (1849), quoted in Hornbuckle v. Plantation Pipeline Co., 212 Ga. 504, (1956).

3. Other manifestations of state concern for the unborn child.

That the State seeks to afford security to the fetus is also demonstrable in other ways. The criminal abortion law is only one of the public policy manifestations. A putative father is obligated to provide not only for the maintenance and education of his illegitimate child, but also for the pre-birth expenses incurred with respect to such child. Ga. Code of 1933, § 74-9901. Since at least 1793, the posting of security for the support and education of an illegitimate child has been required even before its birth. Ga. Code of 1933, § 74-301 et seq. The concealment by a woman of the death of her unborn child which, if it were born alive would be a bastard, was a misdemeanor. Ga. Code of 1933, § 26-1106. In Bull v. State, 80 Ga. 704 (1888), a father who abandoned his child before it was born and persisted after its birth, was declared guilty of a misdemeanor. Hornbuckle v. Plantation Pipeline Co., supra, and Fallow v. Hobbs, 113 Ga. App. 181 (1926), illustrate legal protection to unborn children in the area of torts. In property law also, legal rights are established. Ga. Code of 1933, § 113-904, as amended Ga. Laws 1968, p. 1093, provides the rules of inheritance, and Ga. Code of 1933, § 36-310 protects unborn remaindermen. See also New v. Fennell, 222 Ga. 630 (1966). Contrary to Appellants' statement (Appellants' Brief, p. 24, fn. 3), a convicted female who was quick with child may not be executed until after delivery of the child when she is no longer quick. Ga. Code of 1933, §§ 27-2519, 27-2520. This list is by no means exhaustive but leaves no doubt as to the State's broad protective policy towards unborn children. 25/

25/ Nor does the State abandon them after the event of birth. See provisions for adoption, Ga. Code Ann. Chapter 74-4; Bastardy Proceedings, provided in Chapter 74-3; Children and Youth Act, authorizing a wide range of services under the State Division of Children and Youth, Chapter 99-2; Medical and Welfare Assistance Programs pursuant to Ga. Code Ann. §§ 99-142 through 99-146; "Hospital Care for the Indigent" Program, Ga. Code Ann. Chapter 88-23.

D. THE ABORTION LAW MANIFESTS A LEGITIMATE BALANCING OF COMPETING RIGHTS AND INTERESTS.

Now that the interest of the State in protecting from unchecked slaughter the unborn but alive children over which it exerts jurisdiction has been documented, it remains to examine the exertion of that interest in connection with the competing interest of some pregnant women to free themselves from the responsibilities of providing the harbors for those unborns. The introduction of the conceived and developing life into the picture gives it an unavoidable new dimension and makes it inapposite to that which exists in the right to privacy and marital relationship cases. In circumstances such as that litigated in Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, the State had no legitimate objective which justified its interference with the rights that transcended even the specific enumerations of the Constitution. Here, however, the entity of the living embryo or fetus becomes a factor which may not be overlooked. It has entered the continuum of the life cycle, and the fact that it needs the environment of the mother's womb to survive and develop to maturity for birth removes control of its existence from the mother's uncensured desires. Though she may wish to be "let alone", she has already altered the possibility of such an independent status.

The State, however, recognizing its own limitations and the shortcomings of the world in which it must operate today and recognizing also the need to secure the happiness and health and well-being of women who become pregnant, has sought to strike a balance between the competing interests of the woman and the unborn child. It has therefore afforded to the developing fetus not an absolute legal right but rather a right circumscribed by limitations which are reasonably related to other legitimate state goals.

Hence, the 1968 extension of the exceptions to the general rule forbidding all abortions except to preserve the mother's life. The effort to grasp the weighty issues involved in the complex aspects of the relationship between the unborn child and the unwanting pregnant woman is fraught with questions that reach every area of human knowledge and judgment, including the medical, the scientific, the legal, the economic, the moral, and so on. The State has always recognized in this matter of abortion that there are competing protectible rights. Consequently, its attempt to balance these rights throughout its history demonstrates its acknowledgement of its duty to do so. "(T)he right of every person 'to be let alone' must be placed in the scales with the right of others . . .", said this Court in the context of communications in Rowan v. Post Office Department, 397 U.S. 728, at 736 (1970).

Here, the State has struck a balance which it believes is in keeping with the times, and this balance is surrounded with the safeguards of careful decision-making by those best qualified to make what remains in the final analysis a medical decision, checked by the availability of judicial review. Such an effort cannot, on its face, be regarded as contrary to constitutional principles. The resolution of the intertwined interests, rights, responsibilities, and duties is primarily a state function. The responsibility of this Court, on the other hand, as it has clearly recognized, is rather to construe and enforce the Constitution and laws of the land as they are, and not to legislate social policy. Evans v. Abney, 396 U.S. 435 (1970). Nor does it sit as a superlegislative body and become concerned with what philosophy a state should or should not embrace. Sniadach v. Family Finance Corporation of Bayview, 395 U.S. 337 (1969)

And yet this is precisely what Appellants urge this Court to do here. The economic, social and even philosophical problems presented should more appropriately be taken up with the state legislature and should not be foisted onto the Court, as these matters are not its business. Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471 (1970). The State has clearly demonstrated that it has a valid state objective in the criminal abortion laws, an objective continually existent in Georgia for almost 200 years, and the adoption of a new scheme which was patterned after a widely extoled "model" statute does not contravene constitutional requisites but rather is within that broad scope which legislative bodies have to experiment with social problems. Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726 (1963).

E. APPELLANTS' CLAIMS IN THIS COURT SHOULD BE DISMISSED.

In considering the merits of Appellants' substantive claims, the Court need not assess the wisdom or providence of the policy underlying the state law. As has been enunciated, its duty is at an end when it finds that the federal constitution does not deny the state the power to enact such policy into law.

Carpenters and Joiners Union of America v. Ritter's Cafe, 315 U.S. 722, reh. den. 316 U.S. 708 (1942). Let it not be surmised for a moment, however, that doubts should arise as to the wisdom of the policy here. It is widely accepted as basic. As succinctly put:

> ". . . the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection before as well as after birth." Declaration of the Rights of the Child, General Assembly of the United Nations, November 20, 1959, Official Records of the General Assembly, 14th Session, pp. 19-20.

And here, where Appellants would try to give a myriad of unconstitutional constructions to the statute which has yet to be tested or construed in the state courts, the failure of Appellants to show that it is scarred with an inevitable unconstitutional effect, should lead to its current reinstatement. United States v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968). The unconstitutional interpretations affixed by Appellants to the provisions of the criminal abortion law are products of only one approach. They are not authoritative interpretations and indeed such interpretation by the courts of the state could well lead to an avoidance of the constitutional issues sought to be engendered by Appellants. Reetz v. Bozanich, 397 U.S. 82 (1970).

Attention is briefly directed to some of the remaining sections attacked by Appellants.

1. The standard remaining is not vague.

The claim is that the court-revised standard is unconstitutionally vague. By striking certain portions of the statute, the court below obtained in effect a prohibition against abortions other than those that were "necessary in the best clinical judgment" of the physicians charged with making the determination. (A. 88; Appellants' Brief, pp. 3-4). The judgment was to have a broad medical basis, i.e., the totality of circumstances surrounding each patient. (A. 163).

The standard enunciated below clearly departs from the intent of the legislature to more strictly curtail destruction of fetal life, and the State disputes the validity of the court's adopting such a standard while at the same time we assert that the standards enumerated by the legislature pass constitutional muster.

Without taking the side of the court-constructed standard, Appellees dispute the proposition that it is void for vagueness. It is, on its face, not unlike the judgment which physicians daily apply in determining whether a myriad of other medical procedures should be undertaken. The Oath of Hippocrates, as a matter of fact, provides in part:

> "I will follow that system of regimen which, according to my ability and judgment, I consider for the benefit of my patients, and abstain from whatever is deleterious and mischievous." 14 Encyclopedia Americana, p. 201.

If the State law as adopted by the legislature is not ultimately reinstated, it is submitted that the experience of physicians in applying the court-enunciated standard since mid-1970 would be most pertinent to a determination as to whether it was impermissibly vague.

Finally, viewed in the context of the Court's opinion in United States v. Vuitch, 400 U.S. 813 (1971), the medically-weighted standard should not be regarded as unconstitutionally vague at this juncture.

2. On the face of the statute, due process is not denied the abortion-seeking woman.

Appellants suggest that due process is not provided by the procedural aspects of the statute. However, it is obvious that the procedure delineated is a workable outline. The approval requirements may well be construed to include personal confrontation with an abortion committee, mechanics for the apprisal of the applicant of the reason for denial, or a review procedure when the initial decision is adverse. Only the bare requisites of the procedure are outlined in the statute, which is broad enough to embrace whatever constitutional requirements are applicable. The many constitutional issues broached by Appellants in their wholesale and many-faceted attack are thus premature. The preliminary guesses regarding local law and the mere possibility of unconstitutionality upon which Appellants' postulate rests, make their claims inappropriate for further consideration at this stage. Spector Motor Service v. McLaughlin, 323 U.S. 101 (1944); Leiter Mineral, Inc. v. United States, 352 U.S. 220, reh. den. 352 U.S. 1019

(1957); Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township, 330 U.S. 1, reh. den. 330 U.S. 855 (1947).

Since there is no evidence that due process cannot be afforded pursuant to the statute, facial constitutionality in this regard is not obviated. As the Court noted in United States v. Five Gambling Devices, etc., 346 U.S. 441 (1954), a statute should be construed in a manner that requires decision of serious constitutional questions only if the statutory language leaves no reasonable alternative. See also United States v. Witkovitch, 353 U.S. 194 (1957); Driscoll v. Edison Light and Power Co., 307 U.S. 104, reh. den. 307 U.S. 650 (1939).

It is submitted that even the court-announced standard considered in the context of the criminal statute, gives adequate notice and fair warning of the conduct which it prohibits. Cf Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347 (1964); Wright v. Georgia, 373 U.S. 284 (1963); conformed to, 219 Ga. 125.

3. The residency requirement is not an unconstitutional limitation.

None of the Appellants reside outside of Georgia and thus they have no standing to challenge this portion of the statute. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968). In addition, they fail to show that it is not reasonably related to a legitimate State interest. A restriction in whether a non-resident may obtain an abortion in Georgia is related, first of all, to their own health and safety. Complications arising after the procedure is accomplished and she returns to her home out-of-state are out of the reach of medical treatment by the physician who performed the procedure. Secondly, the State is vitally interested in containing and controlling the number and quality of abortions performed in the hospital which must provide care for enumerable other residents who need it.

The right of a pregnant woman to travel is not thereby infringed in any way. Her movement is not burdened or restricted one iota by this requirement, and she is as free to come and go throughout Georgia as though she were not seeking a termination of pregnancy. Moreover, more is involved here than merely a "medical service". The destruction of another entity casts abortion in an entirely different light.

4. None of the claims asserted are here cognizable.

As to the remaining complaints regarding the procedure, equal protection, and the "right" of physicians, it is submitted that Appellants have advanced nothing which might render the statute unconstitutional on its face. Whether the statute might operate to deprive anyone of a constitutional right or be applied in an unconstitutional manner, is not here at issue. Nor do any of the Appellants present a situation which gives them standing to advance these blanket complaints. Therefore, there is no justiciable controversy or cognizable complaint in these regards.

Moreover, it is submitted that even if the issues had been properly raised, abstnetion would be appropriate in this case involving the construction of a state criminal statute. Appellants have, and had, available to them the state court forum, and determination of the many issues here raised in that arena may very well avoid any necessity for a consideration of serious constitutional proportions. Railroad Commission of Texas v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941); Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315 (1943); Louisiana Power & Light Co.

v. City of Thibodaux, 360 U.S. 25 (1959); Alabama Public Service Commission v. Southern Railway, 341 U.S. 363 (1951).

CONCLUSION

The General Assembly of Georgia has enacted and updated the criminal abortion statute. The declaration of what shall be offenses against the State's laws is peculiarly within the power of each state of the union, except only as its authority is limited by the Constitution of the United States. Ex parte Reggel, 114 U.S. 642 (1885). The responsibility for defining and prosecuting crimes is the principle responsibility of the states. Abbate v. United States, 359 U.S. 187 (1959). Appellants have not shown here, nor in the court below, that the statute or any of its parts must be declared unconstitutional facially.

Moreover, the questions put by Appellants are not ripe for determination. As clearly put by this Court in Thorpe v. Housing Authority of City of Durham, 393 U.S. 268 (1969), it will not decide abstract, hypothetical, or contingent questions or any constitutional question in advance of the necessity for its decision. See also, United States v. Raines, 362 U.S. 17 (1960); International Longshoreman's & Warehouseman's Union v. Boyd, 347 U.S. 222, 224 (1954).

Consequently, Appellees respectfully submit that the decision and judgment below should be reversed and remanded for dismissal, for lack of jurisdiction below, or alternatively, that the underlying right of the state to restrict abortions as Georgia has done by the laws of 1968, be established.

APPENDIX "A"
FOREWORD
OPINIONS OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, 1970

"It is the duty of the Attorney General, when required to do so by the Governor, to give his opinion in writing on any question of law connected with the interest of the State or with the duties of any of its departments. Ga. Code Ann. § 40-1602 Par. 1.

To avoid requiring the Governor to endorse requests for opinions originating with the departments of the State, the Attorney General receives such requests directly from the department heads.

Opinions rendered to the Governor and to the heads of departments are classified as 'official opinions.'

In addition to 'official opinions,' the office of the Attorney General renders 'unofficial opinions' to other state officers (e.g. legislators, district attorneys) and to county and municipal attorneys on questions involving the general laws of the State.

Each 'unofficial opinion' bears the following notation: 'The views expressed herein are the completely unofficial views of the writer only, and should be considered as information only.'"

APPENDIX "B"
GA. LAWS 1876, p. 113

An Act to prevent and punish fœticide or criminal abortion in the State of Georgia.

Section I. Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this Act, the wilful killing of an unborn child, so far developed as to be ordinarily called "quick," by any injury to the mother of such child, which would be murder if it resulted in the death of such mother, shall be guilty of a felony, and punishable by death or imprisonment for life, as the jury trying the case may recommend.

Sec. II. Be it further enacted, That every person who shall administer to any woman pregnant with a child, any medicine, drug, or substance whatever, or shall use or employ any instrument or other means, with intent thereby to destroy such child, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such mother, or shall have been advised by two physicians to be necessary for such purpose, shall, in case the death of such child or mother be thereby produced, be declared guilty of an assault with intent to murder.

Sec. III. Be it further enacted, That any person who shall wilfully administer to any pregnant woman any medicine, drug or substance, or anything whatever, or shall employ any instrument or means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage or abortion of any such woman, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman, or shall have been advised by two physicians to be necessary for that purpose, shall, upon conviction, be punished as prescribed in section 4310 of the Revised Code of Georgia.

Sec. IV. Repeals conflicting laws.

I. THE UNBORN CHILD OR FOETUS IS OR MAY BE REASONABLY TREATED BY THE STATE AS A PERSON WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS OF THE PERSON CONTAINED IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, AND ESPECIALLY IN THE FOURTH, FIFTH, NINTH, AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS ----------	4

The Concept Of The Person Utilized In The Constitution of the United States And In Its First Ten Amendments Had A Well-defined Meaning For Those Who Framed And Adopted Their Provisions That Clearly Included The Unborn Child Who Was Deemed By Them To Be A Subject Of Rights, Including The Right To Life -	8
C. Regard For The Context Of The Constitution, In The Sense Of Its Whole Framework In Relation To Its Various Parts And Especially Those Provisions Providing Safeguards For The Person, Such As The Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments, Argues Strongly For Holding That An Unborn Child Or Foetus Is A Person Within The Meaning Of Those Safeguards -	28

2. The Unborn Child Has Constitutional Right To Application of State Common Law In Diversity of Citizenship Actions At Common Law Under Article III And To A Jury Trial Under The Seventh Amendment ----- 29

3. The Citizenship Clause Of The Fourteenth Amendment Recognizes The Unborn Child As A Person, Who, When Born, Obtains The Further Status Of A Citizen ---------- 33

4. The Concept Of Property Utilized In The Due Process Clauses Of The Fifth And Fourteenth Amendments Has Reference Primarily To The Concept Of Property In State Law. Thus, To The Extent That State Law Of Property Recognizes That The Unborn Child Has Property Rights, The Due Process Clauses Of These Amendments Protects The Unborn Child As A Person ---------- 38

THE UNBORN CHILD BEING A PERSON AND HAVING THE RIGHT TO LIFE WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS OF THE PERSON, THE STATE HAS THE DUTY OR THE RIGHT UNDER THE CONSTITUTION TO PROTECT THE LIFE OF THAT CHILD REASONABLY VIS-A-VIS ITS SINGLE MOTHER OR MARRIED PARENTS WHO DESIRE TO TERMINATE ITS LIFE WITHOUT UNREASONABLY AFFECTING THE RIGHTS OF THE LATTER ---------- 76

A. The State Is Faced With A Difficult Decision-Making Problem In Resolving The Correlative Rights Of The Unborn Child As A Person And Of Its Single Mother Or Married Parents And Its Decision To Protect The Life Of The Unborn Child Through An Abortion Statute Should Be Allowed To Stand If It Is A Reasonable Decision ---------- 76

B. The State Cannot Reasonably Leave The Fate Of The Unborn Child To Be Decided By Private Persons Such As The Appellants In This Case Either With Respect To Whether An Abortion Should Be Performed Or With Respect To The Appropriate Reason For An Abortion. To Do So Would Be An Unconstitutional Delegation Of Authority And A Denial Of Equal Protection Of The Laws ---------- 89

C. The Affirmative, Particular Reasons That Can Be Adduced In Behalf Of The Texas Law Of Abortion Demonstrate The Reasonableness Of The State Legislative Judgment To Enact And

Maintain That Law And They Counsel Extreme Caution On The Part Of Federal Courts In Declaring That State Legislative Judgment To Be Unconstitutional ---------- 100

III. SINCE THE UNBORN CHILD IS A PERSON AND HAS A RIGHT TO LIFE PROTECTED BY THE FOURTH, FIFTH, NINTH, AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS, IF THIS COURT SUSTAINS THE LOWER COURT DECISION THAT ARTICLES 1191-1194 AND 1196 OF THE TEXAS PENAL CODE ARE UNCONSTITUTIONAL AND TO BE GIVEN NO FURTHER OPERATION, THIS COURT MUST ALSO RENDER A DECISION STATING THE GROUNDS UPON WHICH ABORTIONS MAY CONSTITUTIONALLY BE SECURED OR PERFORMED AND PROVIDE OR DESIGNATE THE TRIBUNALS FOR ADMINISTRATION OF THOSE STANDARDS IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF BOTH SUBSTANTIVE AND PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS AND EQUAL PROTECTIONSOF THE LAWS UNDER THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT AND, SINCE IT IS FEDERAL ACTION THAT CREATES THE HAZARD FOR UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE FOURTH, FIFTH, AND NINTH AMENDMENTS ---------- 118

INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE

The Association of Texas Diocesan Attorneys appears as amicus curiae with the written consent of both parties, given in letters which have been filed with the Clerk of this Court. The Association is organized to provide mutual aid and benefit for its members in dealing with all problems of a legal nature relating to bishops, priests, religious, dioceses, parishes, orders, congregations, societies in the Roman Catholic Church, and their work, and all that relates thereto. The Association has been in existence for a number of years and has an active voting membership consisting of licensed Texas lawyers designated by their respective Ordinaries. While subserving the end for which it was organized, the Association is an autonomous one and independent of the above-mentioned Church. One of the legal problems relating to the named offices, divisions, and societies of the Church with which they, and thus the Association, are concerned is the problem of abortion. The position of the Roman Catholic Church on abortion, long since taken, was elaborated for the first time by a general council of this Church, the Second Vatican Council, and promulgated by Pope Paul Paul VI on December 5, 1965. It stated:

> "Life from its conception is to be guarded with the greatest care. Abortion and infanticide are horrible crimes." Second Vatican Council, De ecclesia in mundo huius temporis (Guadium et spes), sec. 51.

The Roman Catholic Church in the United States and the amicus Association seek to encourage and foster the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and endeavor to vindicate those rights whenever threatened.

Amicus appears here because of its conviction that unborn children have been deprived by the decision of the court below of the protection of a valid state statute prohibiting abortion except in defined circumstances with the effect of denying their federal constitutional right to life and all other federal and state rights consequent upon the enjoyment of this right.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Amicus respectfully refers the Court to the statements of the case incorporated in the brief for appellants but asserts that the statement of appellants contained in their last sentence on page 15 of their brief is incorrect insofar as it advances the argument that the issuance of the judgment by the lower court in declining to enforce its declaratory judgment was one "without meaningful effect." Whether or not that judgment was without meaningful effect depends upon the resolution of constitutional issues presented in this case and focused upon in the brief of amicus.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. the unborn child must or may reasonably be viewed by the State of Texas as a person for the purposes of giving effect through statutory and decisional law to the safeguards of the person contained in the Constitution of the United States as expressed in the Fourth Amendment, the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment, and the Ninth Amendment?

2. Whether, in the event the unborn child must or may reasonably be viewed by the State of Texas as a person for the purposes of giving effect to the safeguards of the person in the Fourth, Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments, the unborn child has a right to life under these amendments vis-a-vis its single mother or married parents who desire to terminate its life that this State has reasonably protected through Articles 1191-1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, which prohibit the performance of abortions unless "procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother"?

3. Whether, in the event the unborn child has a right to life protected by the Fourth, Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments but Articles 1191-1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, although directed to protection of that life, are held to be unconstitutional and to be given no further operation, a federal court can constitutionally delegate the power of decision-making with respect to the continued enjoyment by unborn children of their right to life to private persons, viz., single women, married persons, and physicians such as the appellants in this case without making provision for the grounds upon which abortions may constitutionally be secured or performed and for official institutions to administer such standards in accordance with the requirements of procedural due process?

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Although there are numerous issues involved in this case, this brief will address itself only to three, so as to avoid repetition of the arguments presented by appellee and by other briefs of amicus curiae. We believe that the time is ripe for this Court to determine that the unborn child or foetus is a person for the purpose of administering the safeguards of the person contained in the Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments; that the unborn child, however unwanted or considered to be a burden by its parents, has a constitutionally protected right to life; and that the protection of their lives accorded by a state to unborn children through statutory provisions like Articles 1191-1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code is a reasonable protection that a state can constitutionally provide those children. Stating the last proposition differently, the protection of the unborn child or foetus under statutory provisions like Articles 1191-1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code does not unreasonably impair the personal freedom of married couples or of single women, their right to determine the number and spacing of their children, or their rights to marital privacy, personal privacy, or physical privacy so far as these are constitutionally recognized. Neither do these statutory provisions unreasonably impair the constitutional right of physicians to administer health care to women.

Most of the arguments by appellants and amicus curiae in support of appellants proceed almost exclusively to consider the constitutional rights of married couples and of single women and to analyze the applicable constitutional provisions as well as the judicial gloss upon them without really considering whether, for the purpose of administering the constitutional safeguards of the person, the unborn child or foetus is a person and has the right to life as a matter of federal constitutional right. It is the position of amicus that the unborn child or foetus possesses the status of a person and is entitled to protection of its life as a matter of fundamental federal constitutional right. This court cannot adequately dispose of this case on the merits without a decision upon these and related matters.

Amicus urges this Court to render a decision holding that the three-judge court erred in holding that Articles 1191-1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code are unconstitutional (1) insofar as that decision was reached without recognition that the unborn child or foetus is a person within the meaning of and has a right to life protected by the constitutional safeguards of the person contained in the Constitution of the United States and, most especially, in its Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments; (2) insofar as that court held the right of single women and married persons to choose whether to have children, as protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, was infringed by the above articles; and (3) insofar as the court did not apply in favor of unborn children and the protection of their right to life the same constitutional standard it applied "under the Ninth Amendment" in favor of single women and married persons and their right to choose whether to have children.

ARGUMENT

POINT ONE

THE UNBORN CHILD OR FOETUS IS OR MAY BE REASONABLY TREATED BY THE STATE AS A PERSON WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS OF THE PERSON CONTAINED IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES, AND ESPECIALLY IN THE FOURTH, FIFTH, NINTH, AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS.

A. The Stance From Which The Court Should Approach This Constitutional Issue

In Application of Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946) the petitioner, a defeated general of a recent enemy nation had been sentenced to hang by a United States military commission, asked this Court to consider the issue of whether or not, as he contended, he, as a person, had been deprived of his rights to a fair trial in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment by the action of that commission in admitting in evidence of depositions, affidavits and hearsay and opinion evidence. This Court, in a decision by a divided panel that had been subjected to extensive criticism, refused to pass upon this contention, without even determining whether the petitioner was a "person" entitled to invoke the protection of the clause invoked. In response to the petitioner's contention, the Court simply stated:

> "We have considered, but find it unnecessary to discuss other contentions which we find to be without merit." 327 U.S. at 25.

This case, as it has been handled by the lower court, is very similar to the Yamashita case. It involves a party, here a state officer, who impliedly asserted before the lower tribunal that a certain class of human beings, here unborn children, are "persons" within the meaning of the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments; that these persons have a right to life protected by these clauses; that the State has a right to enact an abortion law to protect that constitutional right; and that the abortion law, as enacted, does not violate the Fourth, Fifth, Fourteenth, or Ninth Amendments insofar as single women and married couples also have constitutional rights protected by these provisions. The lower court, as did this Court in the Yamashita case, did not address itself to the central, primordial constitutional issues that had been properly raised by one of the parties in the case, here the appellee. It is the position of amicus that the decisional process utilized by the lower court was a denial of procedural due process of law to appellee and to the unborn children whose lives were sought to be protected by the statute appellee was attempting to defend as to its constitutionality. Since what the lower court did in this case follows the precedent for that action contained in Yamashita, amicus urges this Court to overrule the latter case at least insofar as it seems to authorize what the lower court did.

Mr. Justice Rutledge, in a dissenting opinion in the Yamashita case, stated the point of view that must surely control consideration of the issues by this Court in this case. Referring to the fact that the decision was "unprecedented in our history," he stated:

> "The novelty is legal as well as historical. We are on strange ground. Precedent is not all-controlling in law. There must be room for growth, since every precedent has an origin. But it is the essence of our tradition for judges, when they stand at the end of the marked way, to go forward with caution keeping sight, so far as they are able, upon the great landmarks left behind and the direction they point ahead. If, as may be hoped, we are now to enter upon a new era of law in the world, it becomes more important than ever before for the nations creating that system to observe their greatest traditions of administering justice, including this one, both in their judging and in their new creation. The proceedings in this case veer so far from some of our time-tested road signs that I cannot take the large strides validating them would demand.
> "...I am completely unable to accept or to understand the Court's ruling concerning the applicability of the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment to this case. Not heretofore has it been held that any human being is beyond its universally protecting spread in the guaranty of a fair trial in the most fundamental sense. That door is dangerous to open. I will have no part in opening it. For once it is ajar, even for enemy belligerents, it can be pushed back wider for others, perhaps ultimately for all.

"The Court does not declare expressly that petitioner as an enemy belligerent has no constitutional rights, a ruling I could understand but not accept. Neither does it affirm that he has some, if but little, constitutional protection. Nor does the Court defend what was done. I think the effect of what it does is in substance to deny him all such safeguards. And this is the great issue in the cause." 327 U.S. at 43, 79.

In this case this Court once again, as in Yamashita, stands on strange ground and at the end of the narked way. The great issue in this case is whether the nborn child or foetus is a person within the meaning of he constitutional safeguards of the person contained in he Constitution of the United States, and especially in ts Fourth, Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments. For, f the unborn child is a person for constitutional purposes, he whole framework of argument and decision must be changed rom that adopted, respectively, by the appellants and the ower court. This result would mean that the unborn child, s a person, is entitled, in general, to the protection of ts life under the Constitution of the United States and hat in assessing the validity of state abortion legisla- ion directed toward the protection of this constitutional ight, the right to life of the unborn child must be con- idered and evaluated by the courts quite as thoroughly and qually as the rights of single women and married couples ith respect to marital privacy, personal privacy, physical ntegrity, personal freedom, and determination of the num- er and spacing of their children.

In short, amicus urges this Court squarely to face nd resolve the issue properly and explicitly raised by the ppellee, a state officer charged with the performance of important function by his state, as to whether the un- orn child or foetus is a person within the meaning of the onstitutional safeguards of the person contained in the onstitution of the United States, and especially in its Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments, and as to whether the unborn child or foetus, as a person, has a constitutional right to life. To do otherwise would be for this Court to deny procedural due process to appellee and to all those whom, in the name of the State of Texas, this appellee represents.

B. The concept of the person utilized in the Constitution of the United States and in its first ten Amendments had a well-defined meaning for those who framed and adopted their provisions that clearly included the unborn child or foetus who was deemed by them to be a subject of rights, including the right to life, and a person to whom its parents as well as political society itself owed important duties of care and support. As a matter of sound constitutional interpretation theory, this Court must recognize and apply this meaning of the concept of the person and implement the purpose underlying the employment of this concept as the foremost principle of this Constitution.

Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 179-180, stated "that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that instrument as a rule for the government of courts, as well as of the legislature." While his focus in that case was primarily upon a legislative disregard of a Constitutional rule, it was also upon avoiding a like judicial disregard of that rule. It is not without significance for the instant case that the Chief Justice, in selecting a few of many parts of the Constitution to illustrate his basic proposition, referred to one of the explicit safeguards of the person contained in the Constitution, Section 3 of Article III:

> "No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court." Ibid.

It would have been just as inadmissible by the Chief Justice and the other members of the Court in 1803 that this rule did not speak to and bind the Court insofar as it provided that a "person" was to be protected by the rule as it was inadmissible to them that the type of the protection to be accorded the person as specified in this rule did not speak to and bind the Court. Not just part but the whole of this and other rules of the Constitution must be deemed to be "rules for the government of courts." Thus, each of the rules of the Constitution providing a safeguard either expressly or impliedly for the "person," including the Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments, must be viewed in the same way. For this reason, the inevitable first task for the Court in this case, where a state asserts the right of the unborn child, as a person, to live, as the basis for sustaining its challenged abortion law, is to determine what is the appropriate meaning to be assigned the term "person" expressly or impliedly used by the framers of the Constitution in establishing its fundamental safeguards of the person. The Court must recognize that the Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments also provide a "rule for the government of the legislature" of a state in the sense that the state is entitled and in some instances duty bound to take positive, affirmative action to protect the federal constitutional rights of the persons safeguarded by them. See, e.g., Brewer v. Hoxie School District No. 46, 238 F.2d 91 (8th Cir. 1956).

Chief Justice Marshall in the Marbury case provided the essential principle for approaching the problem of determining the meaning of the term "person" as used in the Constitution. He said:

> "That the people have an original right to establish, for their future government, such principles as, in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness, is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it nor ought it to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established, are deemed fundamental. And as the authority from which they proceed is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent." 1 Cranch at 176.

Of all the principles the people of the United States established in their Constitution none can be more paramount than those designed by them for safeguarding the civil rights of the individual person. Indeed, so concerned were the people of the United States for providing these safeguards that it is altogether likely that the Constitution, which did not contain such safeguards in the form of a Bill of Rights as did the state constitutions, would not have been adopted by sufficient states unless the Federalists, sensing the impending disaster, had not made a gentlemen's agreement that they would propose and submit in the First Congress in 1789 detailed amendments to establish a comprehensive federal Bill of Rights.[1] Both John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, when they first received news of the Constitution at their London and Paris ministerial posts, respectively, agreed that they were very distressed that it did not contain a bill of rights providing "for the whole catalog of civil rights commonly accepted as fundamental in America" to guarantee freedom of the person.[2] This agreement was, of course, carried out by the next Congress on September 25, 1789.

Moreover, it was the "original right" of the people of the United States to adopt a concept of the person for inclusion in and administration of their Constitution as "in their opinion, shall most conduce to their own happiness," as Marshall stated. It is the meaning and the purpose of the people who framed, debated, and adopted the Constitution and its Bill of Rights to safeguard the person that must be respected by this Court. Even if many of the present generation have come to view the religious motivation, the philosophy of natural rights, and the views of the person entertained by the framers and adopters of the Constitution as lacking in validity, this Court is not free, because of its dedication and commitment to the rule of law, to disregard the meaning of the concept of person the framers entertained when they inserted it into the constitution safeguards of the person. It was their "original right to establish, for their future government" the principles that "in their opinion" were to be subsequently treated as "fundamental" and as "designed to be permanent." Citizens may today reject, although with perhaps great loss of societal direction, the religious motivations, philosophy of natural rights, and view of the person entertained by the constitutional framers, but they cannot avoid or set aside the objective choice made by those framers of the meaning to be given the normative concept of the person placed by them in the Constitution. If this Court must respect still today the choice of the framers in the First Amendment rule that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof...," it must also still respect the rule that "nor shall any person... be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." If we must be very vigilant about judicially enforcing the requirement that "no law" respecting an establishment or religion shall be made, we must also be very vigilant about judicially assuring that any person obtains due process of law with respect to deprivations of his life, liberty, or property by action of the state or nation.

Chief Justice Marshall has also provided this Court with the interpretative theory to implement the basic approach he laid down for assigning meaning to provisions of the Constitution. In Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 188-189, while referring to the problem of construction of a clause conferring a power upon Congress, he stated:

> "As men, whose intentions require no concealment, generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlighted patriots who framed our constitution, > and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have intended what they have said. If, from the imperfection of human language, there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, it is a well-settled rule that the objects for which it was given, especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself, should have great influence in the construction. We know of no reason for excluding this rule from the present case."

Precisely the same reasons that commended this rule of constitutional interpretation to the Court for the purpose of assigning meaning to a provision granting power to Congress commends it even more highly as the basis for assigning meaning to provisions designed for the safeguarding of the persons who established the constitution. In Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 635, Mr. Justice Bradley in the opinion for the Court stated this principle:

> "...illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely: by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis."

Still another principle of constitutional interpretation bears even more closely upon the function of this Court in giving effect to the safeguards of the person which the people of the United States established in the exercise of their "original right." This principle was also articulated by this Court in the Boyd case, supra, and has reference to the relevance of conceptions of personal freedom entertained by those who framed the provisions of the Constitution and its first ten amendments. In the Boyd case, the question was whether a statute which provided for compulsory production of a man's private papers to be used in evidence against him in a proceeding to forfeit his property, was unconstitutional as authorizing an unreasonable search and seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. In deciding that the statute was unconstitutional, the Court referred to the contemporary conceptions of personal freedom entertained by American statesmen at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and of the first ten amendments to it. The subject of unreasonable searches and seizures had been thoroughly canvassed in the quarter of a century just preceding their adoption, and especially in the discussion of Lord Camden in the celebrated case of Entick v. Carrington, 19 Howell, St. Tr., 1029. Referring to this discussion, Justice Bradley stated for the Court:

> "As every American statesman, during our revolutionary and formative period as a nation, was undoubtedly familiar with this monument of English freedom, and considered it as the true and ultimate expression of constitutional law, it may be confidently asserted that its propositions were in the minds of those who framed the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution, and were considered as sufficiently explanatory of what was meant by unreasonable searches and seizures. ...Can we doubt that when the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States were penned and adopted, the language of Lord Camden was relied on as expressing the true doctrine on the subject of searches and seizures, and as furnishing the true criteria of the reasonable and unreasonable character of such seizures?" 116 U.S. at 627, 630.

Putting these three long established and honored principles of constitutional interpretation to work in this instant case requires this Court to hold that the unborn child was clearly within the meaning of the concept of the person adopted by the American statesmen who formulated the Constitution and its first ten amendments and that it was their purpose to have its safeguards of the person applied by courts and legislatures to the unborn child or foetus and especially so as to recognize a constitutionally guaranteed right to life.

James Wilson, who helped formulate, voted for, and signed the Declaration of Independence, participated in the Constitutional Convention and signed the proposed Constitution of the United States, and served as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States had something to say about the concept of the person.[1] This remarkable Pennsylvania lawyer, member of the Continental Congress, classical scholar, draftsman of the Pennsylvania Constitution, and person chiefly responsible for the adoption of the Constitution of the United States by Pennsylvania was also a professor of law at the College of Philadelphia at the same time he served upon the Supreme Court of the United States. Steeped in the philosophy of natural law and well-acquainted with the basic concepts of those revolutionary times, he was in an especially good position to articulate the meaning of the concept of the person generally shared by his fellow citizens and woven into the sinews of the colonial and state Bills of Rights and finally into the Constitution of the United States. In his law lectures delivered in the winter of 1792, Justice Wilson stated:

> "Persons are divided into two kinds — natural and artificial. Natural persons are formed by the great Author of nature. Artificial persons are the creatures of human sagacity and contrivance; and are formed and intended for the purposes of government and society."[2]

In this statement Wilson was simply reflecting the ommon view of the Constitutional Fathers that the person as not something subject to man's contrivance, like the rtificial person which is the corporation or the state, ut above and apart from and prior to any construction or ontrivance of man. The person was for the makers of our onstitution a datum, a given, a being created "by the reat Author of nature." The status of person was not omething to be conferred by the state or even all the eople of the state. A person simply is and has his being y virtue of an act of creation by God himself — this was he concept of the person for those who wrote and adopted he Constitution of the United States.

This concept of the person was Christian in its rigin and in its development. Its meaning had been laborated long before the period of American constitution-aking even if it had never been woven as securely into the abric of a legal order as it was to be in 18th Century erica. Man was deemed to be a composite of body and soul, he latter having been given to him closely consequent upon he human event of conception in an act of creation by "the nly Creator of human souls: God."[1] As Doctor John itherspoon, the sixth president of Princeton University nd signer of the Declaration of Independence, observed and aught his students:

> "Considering man as an individual, we discover the most obvious and remarkable circumstances of his nature, that he is a compound of body and spirit."[2]

No man had greater influence upon the minds of the Constitutional Fathers than John Locke. His Second Treatise of Government was characterized by Sir Frederick Pollock as "probably the most important contribution ever made to English constitutional law by an author who was not a lawyer by profession."[2] Beyond this it has been generally recognized that "the principles of the American Revolution were in large part an acknowledged adoption of the ideas it contained."[3] In Locke's discussion of paternal, or as he preferred to call it, "parental" power, he observes that

> "Adam and Eve, and after them all parents were, by the law of Nature, under an obligation to preserve, nourish and educate the children they had begotten, not as their own workmanship, but the workmanship of their own Maker, the Almighty, to whom they were to be accountable."[4]

"The power, then, that parents have over their children arises from that duty which is incumbent on them, to take care of their offspring during the imperfect state of childhood. ...that duty which God and Nature has laid on man, as well as other creatures, to preserve their offspring till they can be able to shift for themselves..."[1]

Locke pointed out that although the parental duty after procreation of children to care for them could not be put aside until they could shift for themselves, the name and authority of a father or indeed any parent over a child could be quickly lost:

"So little power does the bare act of begetting give a man over his issue, if all his care ends there, and this be all the title he hath to the name and authority of a father."[2]

Locke was simply making the point of the great concern of political society for children and its insistence upon their protection from and after the act of procreation. The name and authority of the parent could be lost if that parent disregarded the very precious value borne by the child as a person through the soul created for it by God. Thus, the foster-father who rescued and then took care of a child who had been exposed by its natural father for the purpose of letting it die gains the title and authority of father and the latter loses it.[3]

Again, in order to emphasize the importance of the child, because it is a person created by God at all of its stages of development, Locke states:

[2]Id.

[3]Id. at 147.

"Conjugal society is made by a voluntary compact between man and woman and though it consists chiefly in such a communion and right in one another's bodies as is necessary to its chief end, procreation, yet it draws with it mutual support and assistance, and a communion of interest, too, as necessary not only to unite their care and affection, but also necessary to their common offspring, who have a right to be nourished and maintained by them till they are able to provide for themselves.

"For the end of conjunction between male and female being not barely procreation, but the continuation of the species, this conjunction betwixt male and female ought to last, even after procreation, so long as is necessary to the nourishment and support of the young ones. ...This rule...the infinite wise Maker hath set to the works of His hands..."[1]

Moreover, a person, whether a child or an adult, was deemed superior, in a very basic sense to the state and to its law, even its most fundamental law, the constitution. Not only was the person not a creation of man or of his state, but the person was before and above the state and its constitution. Locke stated the principle that

"Men being,... by nature all free, equal, and independent, no one can be put out of this estate and subjected to the political power of another without his own consent, which is done by agreeing with other men, to join and be united into a community for their comfortable, safe, and peaceable living..."[2]

[2] Id. at 164.

Each of the principal American constitutions and bills of rights made this conception of the person and of his relation of the person to the state abundantly clear. The American Declaration of Independence states:

> "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness....That to secure these rights Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, ..."[1] [Emphasis added]

The principal American constitutions and bills of rights also made it clear that while the adult persons were the persons from whom the just powers of government were actually derived by their consent, these adults relative to their children, unborn or born, were performing an act not only for themselves but also for their children, as trustees or guardians for their lives, futures, and happinesses, according to the Lockeian doctrine. Thus, we see that the Virginia Bill of Rights states:

> "1. That all men are by nature equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity: namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty..."[2] [Emphasis added]

And, as especially pointed out by Alexander Hamilton in his Paper No. 84, the preamble of the Constitution of the United States states:

[1]Donald Barr, July 4, 1776. New York: Crown Publishers, 1958. 138.

[2]Robert Allen Rutland, The Birth of the Bill of Rights: 1776-1791. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Pre-s, 1955. 231.

> "We THE PEOPLE of the United States,...to secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States."[1]

It is not without significance that Hamilton quoted the preamble precisely in the form above set out. He was arguing in this paper that there was no necessity for inclusion of a Bill of Rights in the original Constitution to safeguard the persons constituting the people of the United States against their representatives in government. His argument was that these persons, both individually and collectively, were the source of the authority and power of their representatives and the latter had been granted no authority to abridge the fundamental rights of the person, such as life, liberty, or property. Thus he states:

> "Here, in strictness, the people surrender nothing and as they retain everything, they have no need of particular reservations (of rights)."[2] [parenthesis added]

Thus, by his quotation, Hamilton indicates that he is thinking of the rights not only of adults but also children, both born and unborn, their "posterity." It is these rights, he contends, that are not surrendered to the representatives of the people.

Richard Henry Lee, who was closely associated with Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson and introduced the resolution in the second Continental Congress for declaring independence on July 2, that was adopted two days later, worked vigorously for the addition of a Bill of Rights to the proposed Constitution. An orator whose associates compared with Cicero, he perhaps articulated better than most of the Constitution Fathers the sense of what they were about when he said on October 12, 1787 in a popular pamphlet widely read in the states:

> "...when we are making a constitution, it is to be hoped, for ages and millions yet unborn, why not establish...essential rights, which we have justly understood to be the rights of freemen..."[1]

Dr. John Witherspoon in some of his lectures at Princeton at least as early as 1772:

> "Some nations have given parents the power of life and death over their children, and Hobbs insists that children are the goods and absolute property of their parents, and that they may alienate them and sell them either for a time, or for life. But both these seem ill founded, because they are contrary to the end of this right, viz. instruction and protection. Parental right seems in most cases to be limited by the advantage of the children."[2]

Here Dr. Witherspoon carries through to the constitution-making times, to which he contributed much, the basic doctrine of Locke about the duty of parents and the right of their children vis-a-vis each other.

Thomas Jefferson introduced a bill concerning crimes and punishments in 1779 in the Virginia Legislature. It is interesting that he provided for the penalty of hanging and dissection of the body for the murder of a child by its parent.[3] In view of the usual Founding Father view of the child as a being a person from the very moment of its procreation or begetting by its parents, one would assume that this bill was directed against abortion at any stage of the development of the child in the womb. Jefferson also showed that he was quite familiar with the law of England with respect to abortion as far back as the Laws of King Alfred. He noted that this law penalized the killing both of a pregnant woman and of her child and that that law required the payment or weregild not only for the killing of the mother but also for the killing of the child. He also took the position that despite his espousal of a constitutional safequard for religious freedom, the state could not permit churches in their sacred rites "to murder a child."[1]

Life on the colonial frontiers involved raids upon the early settlements by hostile Indians. The unborn child was a special target of these raids. The Rev. Joseph Doddridge reported upon the Indian attacks in Western Virginia in the latter part of the 18th Century. He stated that children were the special victims of Indian vengeance because they could either become warriors or reproduce the species. With respect to the unborn child, he reported upon its treatment by the hostile Indians and showed the special concern of the colonists for such treatment and what their reaction was:

> "The Indian kills indiscriminately. His object is the total extermination of his enemies. It is not enough that the fetus should perish with the murdered mother, it is torn from her pregnant womb, and elevated on a stick or pole, as a trophy of victory and an object of horror to the survivors of the slain."[2]

[2] Daniel J. Boorstin, The Americans: The Colonial Experience. New York: Vintage Books, 1958. 347-348.

The Indian forays and attacks in which these and other atrocities were committed were not isolated instances seldom repeated. As Boorstin reports:

> "The Indian was omnipresent; he struck without warning and was a nightly terror in the remote silence of backwood cabins....Every section of the seacoast colonies suffered massacres. The bloody toll of the Virginia settlements in 1622, and again in 1644, was never forgotten in the colony. ...Such nightmares shaped the military policy of settlers until nearly the end of the 18th century. ...The apprehension of another visit from the Indians, and of being driven back to the detested fort, was painful in the highest degree, and the distressing apprehension was frequently realized. In such colonial warfare all were soldiers because all lived on the battlefield. ...among Colonial Americans...war was the urgent defense of the hearth by everybody against an omnipresent and merciless enemy."[1]

The loss of children in warfare was an especially drastic loss in colonial America. The colonials placed a very high value upon children not only because, according to their religion they were persons, but also because they were badly needed in the emerging nation. As Boorstin reports:

> "Labor and skills were scarce in colonial America; men had to do many things for themselves simply because they could not hire others to do them."

Benjamin Franklin indicated that it was easy for poor families to get their children instructed in a trade:

> "for the Artisans are so desirous of Apprentices,

[1] Id. at 348-352. [Citing The Rev. Joseph Doddridge]

> that many of them will even give Money to the Parent, to have Boys from Ten to Fifteen Years of Age bound Apprentices to them till the Age of Twenty-one; and many poor Parents have, by the means, on their Arrival in the Country, raised Money enough to buy Land sufficient to establish themselves, and to subsist the rest of their Family by Agriculture."[1]

Thus, colonial Americans generally down through the period of the making of the Constitutuion not only revered and respected the unborn child as a person created by God but saw in the unborn an addition to the family who, after birth, could be the way to meet the labor scarcity on the farm and frontier and to enable the family, particularly the poor one, to establish itself firmly in the cities.

The English law concerning abortion discussed by Jefferson as previously noted, had existed since at least the time of King Alfred with both secular and ecclesiastical laws being directed at the problem although by different kinds of sanctions. The Leges Henrici of the time of Henry I reveals that the ecclesiastical laws provided for a lighter penalty if a woman deliberately destroyed her unborn child within the first forty days following conception and a heavier one if she destroyed her unborn child after that period. The common law courts also handled cases of abortion although they exercised a less extensive jurisdiction than that of the ecclesiastical courts. The rule applied by the former was primarily concerned with abortion of a child that was quick or able to stir in the mother's womb. Blackstone in 1765 observed in his Commentaries:

> "1.Life. This right is inherent by nature in every individual, and exists even before the

the child is actually born.

> Rights of Unborn Child. The offence of abortion of a quick child is not murder, but homicide or manslaughter. An infant in ventre sa mere is supposed in law to be born for many purposes. It is capable of having a legacy made to it. It may have a guardian assigned to it, and may have an estate limited to its use, and to take afterwards by such limitation, as if it were then actually born."[1]

This recognition of the unborn child as a person before the law is highly significant in view of the fact that as Boorstin reports,

> "Blackstone's Commentaries had sold nearly as many copies in America as in England...he had provided for the first time the means by which any literate person could grasp the large outlines of his legal tradition. ...was a godsend to the rising American, to the ambitious backwoodsman and the aspiring politician."[2]

In 1803, only a little over a decade after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States and its first amendments, the English Parliament adopted a statute which characterized as felonies abortions performed either before or after a woman was "quick with child", 43 Geo. III c. 58. The former type of abortion was made punishable by fine, imprisonment, and other lesser penalties. The latter type was made punishable by death. The enactment of this statute may have been a part of the movement of replacing the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, which covered the offense of abortion in a similar way, by enactment of statutes defining crimes to be handled by the common law courts.[1]

We have established that the unborn child or foetus was considered by the Founding Fathers and their fellow citizens to be a person; a subject of rights against its parents from and after their act of begetting or procreating the child until it was born and thereafter until it could shift for itself; a person who was created by the act of God in infusing it with a soul consequent upon the act of procreation; a person, like its parents, endowed by God with unalienable rights to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness and the qualities of being free, equal, and independent; and a person who could not be deprived of these rights and qualities by their parents through a compact or constitution or any other means. This concept of the person was drawn by colonial Americans from their predominantly Christian background; from political philosophers and especially from their principal mentor in political philosophy, John Locke; from ministers and educators like Dr. John Witherspoon of Princeton University; from legal scholars like Blackstone; and especially from their intuition as reinforced by their difficulties and opportunities in dealing with a hostile but bountiful environment.

Since this was the colonial concept of the person, the Founding Fathers who framed the Constitution and their fellow citizens who adopted it must be understood to have employed the word "person" in the constitutional safeguards of the person in what was for them its eminently "natural sense" so as to include the unborn child or foetus. This sense reinforces and supports their goal of wanting to ordain and establish a Constitution not only for themselves but also for their posterity and to secure from the action of wilful men "certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity: namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty." It was the "original right" of the Founding Fathers to adopt such a meaning for the term "person" and to impress it on the Constitution. If effect is to be given to the foundational criterion, established by Marbury v. Madison, supra, for assigning meaning to a constitutional provision- the natural sense in which words are employed and the sense that will promote the objects expressed in the Constitution itself - this Court must hold that the unborn child or foetus is a person within the constitutional safeguards of the person.

Similarly, if effect is to given to the presumption for constitutional interpretation established by Boyd v. United States, supra, that a constitutional provision for the security of the person should be liberally construed, then the term "person" should certainly be extended to cover the unborn child or person, there being so many other good reasons for this construction.

Finally, if effect is to be given to the third basic principle for constitutional interpretation, also articulated in the Boyd case, supra, that contemporary conceptions of personal freedom are to be regarded and particularly those framed in the leading expositions of those conceptions, then the term "person" in the Constitution must clearly be held to cover the unborn child or foetus. The leading expositions were contained in Locke's Second Treatise of Civil Government, supra,; Blackstone's Commentaries on the Law, supra; the Virginia Bill of Rights, and Hamilton's Paper No. 84 in the Federalist, supra. All of these highlighted the position of the unborn child as a person and the duty of parents and political society to provide for its care. The latter two expositions extended this duty to those who make and administer constitutions.

C. Regard for the Context of the Constitution, in the sense of its whole framework in relation to its various parts and especially those provisions providing safeguards for the person, such as the Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments, argues strongly for holding that an unborn child or foetus is a person within the meaning of those safeguards.

1. The concept of context in constitutional interpretation.

The value of an examination of the context in which a statutory provision is set for determining the appropriate meaning to be assigned to it has long been recognized. Justice Frankfurter, in a dissenting opinion in United States v. Monia, 317 U. S. 424 at 431, (1942), gave classic formulation to this value:

> "A statute like other living organisms, derives significance and sustenance from its environment, from which it cannot be severed without being mutilated. Especially is this true where the statute, like the one before us, is part of a legislative process, having a history and a purpose. The meaning of such a statute cannot be gained by confining inquiry within its four corners. On the historic process of which such legislation is an incomplete fragment--that to which it gave rise as well as that which gave rise to it-- can yield its true meaning."

Since McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, it has been well established that the context in which a term is used in the Constitution must be closely regarded in assigning meaning to it. In construing the word "necessary" in the "necessary and proper" clause of Article I, section 8 of the Constitution, Chief Justice Marshall stated that:

> "...in its construction, the subject, the context the intention of the person using them, are all t be taken into view." 4 Wheat. at 407.

A recent example of the context of the Constitution for this purpose was provided in Duncan v. State of Louisiana, 391 U. S. 145 (1968), where this Court pointed out that, in construing a particular constitutional safeguard of the person, such as the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, "it has looked increasingly to the Bill of Rights for guidance..."[1]

As demonstrated by Chief Justice Marshall's opinion for the Court in the McCulloch case, the concept of context includes not only the immediate context of a provision whose meaning is drawn in question but also the more remote context of the whole Constitution, including other parts likely to throw light upon the usage in that provision.

2. The unborn child has a constitutional right to application of state common law in diversity of citizenship actions at common law under Article III and to a jury trial under the Seventh Amendment.

As construed by this Court Article III, Section 2 of the Constitution, which extends the jurisdiction conferred upon the courts of the United States to controversies between citizens of different states, necessarily provides extensive protection for the unborn child or foetus. In Erie Railroad Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U. S. 64 (1938), this Court held that Article III of the Constitution required federal courts exercising jurisdiction in diversity of citizenship cases to apply as their rules of decision the law of the state in which they sit, unwritten as well as written, except in matters governed by the Federal Constitution or by Acts of Congress. Mr. Justice Brandies, in the opinion for the Court, stated that the prior practice of the courts in disregarding the decisional law established by a state's highest court in favor of a federal general common law, was quoting

[1]Dickens, Abortion, pp 148.

Mr. Justice Holmes:

> "an unconstitutional assumption of powers by courts of the United States which no lapse of time or respectable array of opinion should make us hesitate to correct."[1]

As a result of this decision, the interpretation of the Rules of Decision Act of 1789 established by Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, to the contrary was overruled and the constitutional required interpretation substituted for it. While Erie did not involve a plaintiff who was an unborn child or who was representing an unborn child at the time of the injury which occasioned the suit, it set the stage for application by federal courts of the extensive state tort law, property law, and other law protecting the rights of unborn children. This law, as will be seen in Point one, provides extensive protection for the rights of unborn children. Thus, Article III of the Constitution of the United States, the Rules of Decision Act of 1789, and the decision in Erie, supra, now operate together to provide the unborn child with the constitutional status of a person in trials at common law in federal courts in cases where state law in applicable because state law accords that status to that child and that law, whether common law or statute law, is constitutionally required to be applied by these courts.

It would be a strange and bizarre constitutional doctrine that would provide protection for the unborn child as a person for the purpose of applying state law in its behalf in diversity of citizenship cases in federal courts under Article III of the Constitution but would deny protection for that same child in the same courts for the purpose of applying the Fifth, Fourteenth, and Ninth Amendments of the same document in a case in which a state asserted the constitutional validity of a statute under those Amendments designed as a reasonable protection of the constitutional right of that child, as a person, to its life vis-a-vis its mother or parents. This Court should avoid an interpretation of the concept of person which would create such a violent conflict within the Constitution between Article III and the consitutional safeguards of the person contained in the federal Bill of Rights, particularly the Fifth and Ninth Amendments, and in the Fourteenth Amendment. It has refused to reach interepretations. As indicated in the McCulloch, Monia, and Duncan cases, supra, this Court has avoided such results and read the provisions of the Constitution as constituting one harmonious whole, with the purpose and meaning of one part being treated as providing illumination for the construction of its other parts.

Indeed, once this Court reached its decision in the Erie case, it became clear that one of the essential provisions of the federal Bill of Rights, the Seventh Amendment, must be construed to accord the unborn child or its representative an important procedural right at common law. This Amendment provides:

> "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

Yet, in Erie, this Court decided that there was no federal general common law but that in diversity of citizenship cases the rules for decision were constitutionally required to be the law of the state in which its sits, including both the statutory law and the decisional law of state courts. Thus, where, as is universally the case, the unborn child is given various substantive rights under the common law or statutes of a state and that child invokes the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction of a federal court, it would seem eminently clear that not only must that court apply the state common or statute law in question under Article III, but also where the protection of state common law is invoked, it must accord the right of trial by jury to that child or its representatives under the Seventh Amendment. Both that Amendment as a matter of explicit requirement and Article III as construed by this Court in Erie make "the rule of the common law" the rule for decision-making purposes by federal courts, where the suit is at common law. Thus, the decision in Erie necessarily implies, in light of state common law according substantive rights to unborn children, that these unborn children must be recognized to be persons within the meaning of the constitutional safeguard of the person contained in the Seventh Amendment guaranty of a jury trial in suits at common law.

In view of this Court's decisions in the Duncan case, supra, and like cases, the fact that the unborn child must be recognized to be a person within the meaning of the Article III guaranty of the application of state common law in diversity of citizenship cases and within the meaning of the Seventh Amendment guaranty of a jury trial in such cases must surely mean that this Court will give the same scope to the concept of person, as including the unborn child, in administration of the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. Moreover, since the unborn child must be treated as a person within the meaning of the Seventh of the ten Amendments contained in the federal Bill of Rights as well as within the meaning of the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, it seems clear that this Court must also hold that the unborn child must be treated as a person within the meaning of any other Amendment of the Bill of Rights in which the protection provided is relevant to the protection of the interests of the unborn child. This would obviously include the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, the Ninth Amendment, and probably also, the Fourth Amendment protection of "persons against unreasonable . . . seizures." Construction of the concept of person in all of these Amendments must be the same since the federal Bill of Rights was adopted, as previously indicated, as an integral package proposed by the Federalists for the better protection of many fundamental rights of the person after the framers recognized that adoption of the Constitution had become doubtful due to its lack of any guarantees of these rights.

In light of the above considerations it must be concluded that the Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments must be construed to provide guarantees for the protection of the unborn child as a person. Any other holding would be so to sever them from their environment in the whole Constitution and from historical development of the concept of the person at the time of its adoption as to mutilate their "significance and sustenance."

3. The Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment recognizes the unborn child as a person, who, when born, obtains the further status of a citizen. The unborn child has the right to protection of its prospective status as a citizen under the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The first sentence of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment provides:

> "All persons born . . . in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment was drafted by Representative John A. Bingham of Ohio.[1] The debates concerning the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment demonstrates the continuity in the conception of the person as between the times of the American Revolution and those of the post-Civil War period. The view of the person as an act of creation by God when he infuses a soul into the unborn child or foetus upon its being conceived is expressed by the draftsman of Section 1:

> "By that great law of ours it is not to be inquired whether a man is 'free' by the laws of England; it is only to be inquired is he > a man, and therefore free by the law of that creative energy which breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and he became a living soul, endowed with the rights of life and liberty. . . . Every man is entitled to the protection of American law, because its divine spirit of equality declares that all men are created equal ".[1]

Representative Andrew J. Rogers of New Jersey emphasized the two types of right being spoken to by the Civil Rights Bill under discussion in March 1966:

> "There are only two kinds of right: one is that which a man acquires from the municipal laws. There is another right which God gives us, the right of self-defense, the right to protect our lives from invasion by others. There are no other rights but the rights of nature and the great civil rights. . . ."[2]

One of the central purposes of the Citizenship Clause of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment was to make it certain that members of the Negro ethnic group as well as every other class of person obtained the political right of citizenship when born in the United States to add to their natural rights that they were considered to have received at conception from God. A common view of the members of Congress in 1866 was expressed by Representative William Lawrence of Ohio:

> "This clause is unnecessary, but nevertheless proper, since it is only declaratory

[1] Id. at 274.

[2] Id. at 166.

of what is the law without it."[1]

The most significant aspect of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment was to reinforce the rights of the person by conferring upon the "person born . . . in the United States" the political right of citizenship and by making it incumbent upon the states to respect the natural rights of the person. In reinforcing the natural rights of the person vis-a-vis the states, the overriding purpose was to give the concept of person the widest possible coverage. As stated by Senator Arthur I. Boreman of West Virginia:

> "This, you will see, sir, is not confined to citizens of the United States, but it includes every person that is found within these States, and guarantees to all life, liberty, and property, and equal protection of the laws." . . . So that while, before this amendment, any class of persons in this country over whom the protection of the Constitution of the United States was not extended, there cannot now be any longer any question on that subject."[2]

The above extracts from the debates concerning the Fourteenth Amendment and Civil Rights legislation in the post-Civil War period, which are typical, demonstrate not only the continuity of those times with the times of the American Revolution so far as the concept of the person as including the unborn child is concerned, but also manifest a purpose to confer citizenship upon any person upon his birth and to give the concept of person the widest possible application in the event there "was any question whether there were any class of person in this country over whom the protection of the Constitution of the United States was not extended . . ." particularly, in applying to the states a bill of rights comparable to that applicable to the federal government.

Due to its origin and purpose, the Citizenship Clause of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment must be viewed as referring to unborn children, among others, when it speaks of "[A]ll persons born . . . in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. . . ." The unborn child is the "person" before birth who, by virtue of being "born" in the United States, becomes a citizen of the United States. In what sense could an unborn child be in any substantial sense less a "person" 8 minutes, 8 weeks, or 8 months before birth than at the moment of birth or some equivalent time thereafter? The child was, in the view of the person generally accepted at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and of the Fourteenth Amendment, as much a person before birth as after. Its natural right to life came to it, as again expressed by the draftsman of Section 1, by virtue of the fact of creation of its soul by God.

But if the unborn child is a person included within the concept of the person utilized in the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, surely the unborn child must be recognized under this clause to have the right to claim protection from the federal courts for its prospective status when born, of citizenship. Surely, also, the state in which it is present must have the right to enact statute law designed to protect that prospective status of the unborn child also. The Citizenship Clause speaks of two forms of citizenship: a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of the State where the person resides. The State wherein an unborn child resides has a very special reason, aside from its general interest in protecting persons in the enjoyment of their fundamental rights, for protecting the life of the unborn child. That child is a prospective citizen of that State. It is greatly needed by the State and the child greatly needs the State.

If the unborn child cannot obtain the protection of its prospective status as a citizen under the Fourteenth Amendment from federal and state courts and the state legislatures, citizenship of the United States and of a state is a very precarious right. Next to the right to life, the right to citizenship ranks very high in the hierarchy of rights of the person. That was the judgment of the common law and it was the judgment of those who drafted and adopted the Fourteenth Amendment. In general, there can be no citizenship attained by birth unless the right to life of the unborn child is protected. No unborn child can attain its citizenship unless its life is protected from and after the moment of its conception until the moment of birth against action that will certainly destroy it. Thus, protection of the right of the "person born" in the United States to be a citizen of the United States surely cannot be confined only to the period beginning with birth. If that right is to be effectively protected, the unborn child must be recognized to possess a prospective right to citizenship, a right contingent only upon successful completion of the process of birth from a mother living in the United States.

The matter may be viewed in another light. We are accustomed to speaking of the prospective jurisdiction of courts and the necessity they are sometimes under of acting to preserve that jurisdiction. We also speak of the prospective jurisdiction of administrative agencies and the necessity for seeking the aid of courts to preserve the status quo or rights pending the completion of an administrative action. See, e.g., Scripps-Howard Radio, Inc. v. FCC, 316 U.S. 4 (1942); Board of Governors of Federal Reserve System v. Transamerica Corp., 184 F.2d 311 (C.A. 9, 1950) cert. denied, 340 U.S. 883 (1940); West India Fruit and Steamship Co. v. Seatrain Lines, 170 F.2d 775 (C.A., 1948); Public Utilities Commission of District of Columbia v. Capital Transit Co., 214 F. 2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1954). If courts can act to preserve their prospective jurisdiction over such matters as proceedings before administrative agencies and to preserve the jurisdiction of administrative agencies over the subject matters committed to their care, they can and should act to protect their own prospective jurisdiction over unborn children who, when born, are entitled to ask the courts to vindicate their rights to citizenship, e.g., their privileges or immunities as citizens of the United States against state laws that abridge them as protected by the Fourteenth amendment and their entitlement to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states as protected by Section 2 of Article IV.

4. The concept of property utilized in the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments has reference primarily to the concept of property in state law. Thus, to the extent that state law of property recognizes that the unborn child has property rights, the Due Process Clause of these Amendments protects the unborn child as a person. Similar protection for the life and liberty of the unborn child cannot rationally be denied under these Amendments.

As demonstrated in Sterling v. Constantin, 287 U.S. 378 (1932), the concept of property contained in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has primary reference to the law of states under which rights to property are created. The Court observed in this case:

> "The existence and nature of the complainants' rights are not open to question. Their ownership of the oil properties is undisputed." Id. at 396.

The complainants in this case were owners of interests in oil and gas leaseholds in the State of Texas, interests that had been acquired pursuant to the law of property of this state. The same principle must necessarily govern administration of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment with respect to property rights arising under state law.

The common law in England and in this country has long since recognized the right of an unborn child or foetus to take by inheritance, subject to the event of subsequent birth:

"An intestate's posthumous child is considered in being and will inherit just as if he had been born in the intestate's lifetime ...(T)his was the common law rule with respect to both realty and personalty...(A) posthumous child may recover his share of the father's land from a bona fide purchaser obtaining title through a judicial partition sale."[1]

In Texas a child en ventre sa mere is held included among those children in being at the death of the testatrix who are to take under her will. See James v. James, 174 S.W. 47 (Tex. Civ. App., 1914.) By statute in Texas, when a posthumous child is unprovided for by settlement and pretermitted by his father's last will and testament, he succeeds to the same portion of the father's estate as he would have been entitled if the parent had died intestate.[2]

As early as 1795, English courts recognized the rights of the unborn child in property law. In Doe v. Clarke, 2 H.Bl. 399, 126 Engl Rep. 617 (1795), the court held that the description in a devise to "children living at the time of his (the life tenant's) decease" included unborn children. American courts utilized the same approach. In Hall v. Hancock, 15 Pick, 255 (Mass., 1834, Chief Justice Shaw held that an unborn child fell within the meaning of a bequest to grandchildren "living at ... decease." In the case of La Blue v. Specker, 358 Mich. 358, 100 N. W. 2d 445 (1960), an unborn illegitimate child was held to be a child or "other person" having standing to bring suit under a dram shop act, for the death of his father, which had occurred before the child's birth. The Court stated:

[1] Atkinson on Wills (2nd ed. 1953) 75

[2] See, Vernon's Annotated Texas Statutes, Probate Code, Section 66.

"For certain purposes, indeed for all beneficial purposes, a child en ventre sa mere is to be considered as born.... It is regarded as in esse for all purposes beneficial to itself, but not to another....Formerly, this rule would not be applied if the child's interests would be injured thereby, ...but, for purpose of the rule against perpetuities such a child is now regarded as a life in being, even though it is prejudiced by being considered as born.... Its civil rights are equally respected at every period of gestation."[1]

It is important in considering the concept of property at this point to remember the admonition Justice Gray addressed to other members of the New York Court of Appeals in his dissent filed in the case of Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co., 171 N.Y. 538 (Ct. App. N.Y., 1902). He stated:

"Property is not, necessarily, the thing itself, which is owned; it is the right of the owner in relation to it. The right to be protected in one's possession of a thing, or in one's privileges, belonging to him as an individual, or secured to him as a member of the commonwealth, is property, and as such entitled to the protection of the law. The protective power of equity is not exercised upon the tangible thing, but upon the right to enjoy it; and, so, it is called forth for the protection of the right to that which is one's exclusive possession, as a property right."[2]

The majority's forgetting of this fundamental concept of the person as being at the center of even the concept of property led to the rejection of its decision shortly thereafter by the people and the Legislature of the State of New York. (New York Laws, 1903, c. 132, N. Y. Civil Rights Law ss 50, 51.)

Thus, when the state recognizes that the unborn child may take real or personal property under a will or a statute of descent and distribution, it is not only declaring what is "property" that is within the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It is also declaring that the unborn child is a person to be protected with respect to its property right. The very concept of property, as Justice Gray long ago pointed out, is a concept of the person and of the right of the person. It is the state's definition of the person and of the rights of the person relative to property that is referred to by the term "property" in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

If the unborn child is a person protected as to its property under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution of the United States, the child must also be a person under the same clauses for the purpose of the protection of its life and liberty. It would be a strange and bizarre doctrine that protected the property of the unborn child under these Amendments, as is clearly the case, but not its life and liberty. As to life, we are dealing with a matter that is less dependent upon the state for its being than property is. Life is the product of natural processes, although with the Founding Fathers many of us may affirm that it is not wholly so, whereas property is wholly the product, as a concept, of legal processes. The life of the person does not depend for its being so much upon the state as the state depends upon the life of the persons composing it. It is for this reason that the Founding Fathers recognized it to be the foundational right to all other rights. It was perhaps not without significance that they mentioned it before "liberty" and "property" in the Fifth Amendment. Thus, if any lesser right of the unborn child is protected by the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, the foundational right to life of the unborn child must also necessarily be protected by them.

In determining upon the propriety of protecting the unborn child as a person, with respect to its life and liberty, under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and under other constitutional safeguards of the person, this Court should be as guided by decisions of state courts at common law with respect to the protection of the unborn child's life and liberty as it is necessarily controlled by their decisions with respect to the unborn child being a person who may own property when administering the protection of property contained in Due Process Clauses. The Constitution, after the decision in the Erie case, supra, and as applied in the actual administration of the Due Process Clauses, must be taken as at least establishing a principle requiring this Court to give strong consideration, if not a prima facie effect, to state decisional law and statute law in determining who is a person for purposes of the constitutional safeguards of the person. A regard for state decisional and statute law indicates that states have long since determined that the unborn child's liberty and life are to be as much protected at common law and by statutes as the unborn child's property is.

In the area of tort law, the unborn child has come into his own as a person since World War II. In Scott v. McPheeters, 33 Cal.App.2d 629, 92 P. 2d 678 (1939), rehearing denied, 93 P.2d 562 (1939), the court held that a child might sue for injury to her in delivery before birth. The District of Columbia courts reached the same result. Bonbrest v. Kotz, 65 F.Supp 138 (D.D.C. 1946). Since 1946, this result has been generally reached:

> "...(A) series of more than thirty cases, many of them espressly overruling prior holdings, have brought about the most spectacular abrupt reversal of a well-settled rule in the whole history of the law of torts." [1]

The Supreme Court of Texas in 1967, in overruling a prior holding, likewise held that the parents of a viable child who had been injured in the sixth or seventh month of its mother's pregnancy as a result of the defendant's negligence could recover damages for its death after birth due to these injuries. Leal v. C. C. Pitts Sand and Gravel, Inc. Tex. , 419 S.W.2d 820 (1967). On October 6, 1971, the same court extended the new principle of protection to an unborn child injured prior to its having become viable. Delgado v. Yandell, Tex. , (1971) The majority of jurisdictions now recognize that a wrongful death action may be brought for negligently inflicted injury to the unborn child resulting in its death, whether or not it was viable at the time of the injury, and whether born alive or still born. Torigian v. Watertown News Co., 352 Mass. 446, 225 N.E. 2d 926, 927 (1967).[2]

In the area of family law, the courts have recognized the right of the unborn child as a person to support by his parents. Kyne v. Kyne, 38 Cal.App2d 122, 100 P.2d 506 (1940), involved a suit for support brought by the guardian ad litem of a six month's old unborn child against the natural father. The court held that under Section 29 of the Civil Code the father of an unborn child could be compelled by that child, acting through a guardian ad litem, to support it. This section provided that an unborn child "is to be deemed an existing person", so far as may be necessary for its interests..." The court also referred to a provision of the California criminal law having an even broader reach in protecting the unborn child as "an existing person." Section 270 of the California Penal Code, as amended in 1925, St. 1925, p. 544. The Supreme Court of Colorado has recently held that an unborn child is within the concept of "child" utilized in a paternity statute and that a juvenile court may issue temporary orders for support of that child pending adjudication or disposition of the child's case. People v. Estergard, Colo. , 457 P.2d 698 (1969). Otherwise, said the Court, "the father of an unborn child ... (could) evade his responsibility for support by leaving the state at any time prior to the birth of the child."[1]

The unborn child has been recognized as a person to have a right to life that is superior to his mother's right to free exercise of her religion. In Application of the President and Directors of Georgetown College, Inc., 331 F.2d 1000 (C.A. D.C., 1964), cert. den., 377 U.S. 978 (1964), Judge J. Skelly Wright issued, after the District Court for the District of Columbia had refused to do so, an order to a hospital to administer blood transfusions to a mother carrying a seven-month unborn child so far as necessary to save the mother's life, the mother and her husband having refused to permit the transfusions on religious grounds. The Court based his authority for the order upon the lack of right of the parent to forbid the saving of his child's life by action of the state, citing such cases as People ex rel Wallace v. Labrenz, 411 Ill. 618, 104 N.E.2d 769, cert. denied, 344 U.S. 824, 73 S.Ct. 24. It also suggested that the state, in this instance the United States, may also be under a corresponding duty to act in behalf of the mother and child:

> "Under the circumstances, it may well be the duty of a court of general jurisdiction, such as the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, to assume the responsibility of guardianship for her, as for a child, at least to the extent of authorizing treatment to save her life.

"The state, as parens patriae, will not allow a parent to abandon a child, and so it should not allow this most untimate of voluntary abandonments. The patient had a responsibility to the community to care for her infant. Thus the people had an interest in preserving the life of this mother."[1]

In Raleigh Pitkin-Paul Morgan Memorial Hospital v. Anderson, 42 N.J. 421, 201 A.2d 537 (1964) cert. den., 377 U.S. 985 (1964), the Court held that an unborn child was entitled to the Law's protection and thus to obtain a court order directing a blood transfusion for his mother if necessary to save her life or the life of the child. The Court referred to its earlier decision in State v. Perricone, 37 N.J. 463, 181 A.2d 751 (1962), in which it had held that the concern of the state for the welfare of an infant justified the ordering of blood transfusions for the child notwithstanding the objections of its parents on religious grounds. In that case, it cited the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166-167, 64 S.Ct. 438-432.

"Neither rights of religion nor rights of parenthood are beyond limitation. ...The right to practice religion freely does not include liberty to expose...the child...to ill health or death."

The New Jersey Court pointed out that the facts of the case before it:

"clearly evidence a more compelling necessity for the protection of a child's welfare than those in Prince." 181 A.2d at 757.

These decisions should be persuasive to this Court that the unborn child should be considered a person for the purpose of administering the protection of the life and liberty of the person provided by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments just as other decisions by state courts are controlling upon this Court for the purpose of administering the protection of property of the person provided by these same Amendments.

The result of the argument in subpoint C is that there are numerous parts of the Constitution which protect the unborn child as a person. That the unborn child is so protected in these parts of the Constitution should be persuasive to this Court that the unborn child should be held to be a person within the meaning of any constitutional safeguard of the person that is relevant to protecting its interests.

D. The concept of person must be held as much beyond the power of the state or nation to define, in the sense of determining whether or not some child of human beings is entitled to be treated before the law as a person, as it is beyond the power of the state or nation to define the concept of religion, in the sense of determining whether or not some group is pursuing a religious cause and entitled to solicit support for it, and for the same reasons.

This Court held in Cantwell v. State of Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940) that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was violated by a state statute that required a person to obtain a permit as a condition of soliciting support for the perpetuation of his religious views where the official passing upon the permit application was empowered to determine whether the cause for which the solicitation was sought to be done was for a religious cause and to deny the permit if he found the cause was not a religious one.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Roberts stated:

"His (the official's) decision to issue or refuse it involves appraisal of facts, the exercise of judgment, and the formation of an opinion. He is authorized to withhold his approval if he determines that the cause is not a religious one. Such a censorship of religion as the means of determining its right to survive is a denial of the liberty protected by the First Amendment and included in the liberty which is within the protection of the Fourteenth." 310 U.S. at 305. [parentheses added]

By the Cantwell case, this Court put it completely eyond the authority of the state to define what a reli- ious cause is and to determine in light of that state efinition whether the activities of a given group of per- ons constituted the pursuit of religion or of a religious use and thus whether that group would enjoy the right to rvive or live through the efforts of its members in so- iciting support for perpetuation of its views. The con- pt of religion was by this decision held a concept not bject to definition by the state but rather as a concept ving an integrity and meaning independent of the state d to be respected by it. In effect, the Court held that e Fourteenth Amendment insofar as it contained the pro- ction of the person set out in the First Amendment ainst any "law respecting the establishment of religion, prohibiting the free exercise thereof..." took the finition of the concept of religion out of the hands of e state or nation and elevated it to the level of a con- itutional concept. The Court was not called upon in that se to state what the constitutional concept means.

The recognition of the constitutional immunity and dependence of the concept of religion by this Court was d to be necessary for the protection of the free exer- e of the chosen form of religion by way of giving the edom to act "appropriate definition to preserve the en- cement of that protection." 310 U.S. at 304. The "appropriate definition" of the freedom to act in the exercise of one's chosen religion was achieved by preventing the state from determining what a religion or a religious cause is and conditioning one's exercise of his religion thereby.

Similarly, if the concept of the "person" contained explicitly or implicitly in numerous safeguards of the person in the Constitution of the United States is one the state or the nation is permitted to define according to majority vote, the state can readily control by the whim of a capricious majority that looks askance upon various types of person, who is entitled to be treated as a "person" within the state or nation. The concept of person utilized in the Constitution is an even more fundamental concept than the Constitutional concepts of "religion", "freedom of speech", "freedom of the press", "right...peacably to assemble, "petition..for a redress of grievances", "citizen", "right to a speedy and public trial", and many others. It is more fundamental as a concept simply because where a being or person is in a position of claiming that he or she is a "person" within the meaning of the constitutional safeguards of the person, the decision upon this claim can conclude that being's or person's right to life and to all the other rights guaranteed to the person.

The argument just made does not tell us what the definition is of the constitutional concept of the person any more than the decision of this Court in the Cantwell case revealed what the definition is of the constitutional concept of "religion". It does tell us that if that definition is necessary, as it seems to be in order to dispose of this case, it must be made in accordance with the constitutional interpretation criteria that this Court has applied in previous cases. It also tells us that no federal court can rationally dispose of the issues in this case without confronting and resolving the issue of whether an unborn child is a person under the constitutional concept of the person. It also tells that if the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the Constitution then a state has the right to enact a statute seeking to protect the constitutional right to life of the unborn child providing it has done so in a reasonable way.

E. The long continued construction of the Constitution by the Congress and by the Chief Executive as comprehending the unborn child within its concept of the person bind this Court in administering the Constitutional safeguards of the person, particularly the Fourth, Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments.

This Court has long since recognized that a Congressional construction of the Constitution of the United States through the enactment of statutes or resolutions which is either contemporaneous or long continued is "entitled to the greatest respect."[1] Indeed, the respect accorded a contemporaneous or long continued construction of the Constitution by Congress and followed by the executive department over a period of 73 years was so great that it has been held that construction "fixes the construction to be given its provisions" by this Court so that Congress may not thereafter depart from the construction it has, as an institution, been responsible for creating. Myers v. United States, 272 U. S. 52, 175 (1926).

The Congress of the United States enacted a statute in 1825 which adopting, among others, state criminal laws prohibiting abortion for application within federal enclaves located in the different states. 4 Stat. 115 (March 3, 1825). This statute was modeled upon a section of bill drawn by Mr. Justice Story. Of the latter bill, its distinguished author stated:

"The state courts have not jurisdiction of crimes committed on the high seas, or in places ceded to the United States. Rapes, arsons, batteries, and a host of other crimes may in these places be now committed with impunity."[1]

[1] Ex Parte Quirin, 317 U. S., 42 (1942)

The formula proposed and later adopted for dealing with this problem was the following:

> "where the punishment of which offense is not specially provided for by any law of the United States, such offense shall, upon a conviction in any court of the United States having cognizance thereof, be liable to, and receive the same punishment as the laws of the state in which such ...placed, ceded as aforesaid, is situated, provide for the like offense when committed within the body of any county of such state."

The statute came to be called the "Assimilative Crimes Statute." At the time this comprehensive formula was adopted, Congress did not have any law providing specially for the punishment of abortion. However, Connecticut had four years previously enacted an abortion law based upon the English Statute of 1803 (43 Geo. 3, c. 58.) which penalized all forms of abortion whether or not the abortion occurred before the "quickening" of the unborn child. Conn. Stat. Tit. 22 ss14, at 152 (1821). New York added an abortion statute in 1828 (N. Y. Rev. S. Vol. 2, ps 578-579 21 (1836) of the type that became traditional in this country, as was true of Maine in 1840, Ohio in 1841, as well as of Massachusetts and Illinois in 1845 (Mass. St. 1845, c. 27; Ill. R. S., 1845, p. 158, s. 46); of California in 1850 (Stats. 1850, ch. 99, s. 45, p. 233); of Texas in 1854 (Tex. Pen. Code, Arts. 531-536; Texas L. 1854, ch. 49, 58, Texas Penal Code, 1857), Pennsylvania in 1860 (1860, M.L. 382, s. 88), and Colorado in 1861 (L. 1861, p. 296, s. 42), and Virginia in 1848 (L 1847-8, p. 96, ch. 3 §9).[2]

[2] David Granfield, The Abortion Decision.Garden City Doubleday & Co., 1969. 79.

Since the 1825 Federal Act had been held to apply only to places that had been ceded to the United States, prior to its enactment, United States v. Barney, 5 Blatchf. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 14,524, its coverage was much less than the extent of the problem to which Justice Story had sought to direct it. Thus, in 1866, when congress substantially reenacted the 1825 statute it made the law applicable to "any place which has been or shall hereafter be ceded." (14 Stat. 13, April 5, 1866). The effect of this statute was to extend its coverage to all of the states previously mentioned as well as to all others that theretofore or thereafter enacted the traditional form of abortion statutes. All fifty states eventually proscribed abortion. In all of them abortion was permitted to save the life of the mother. In Colorado and New Mexico only was abortion to prevent serious and permanent bodily injury to the mother permitted, and only in Alabama, Oregon, and Massachusetts was abortion to protect the health of the mother permitted.

The policy of The Assimilative Crimes statute has been continuously in effect in this country since 1825 through various reenactments, see United States v. Sharpnack, 355 U.S. 286 at 291 (1958), and is now codified in the Revised Criminal Code as 18 U.S.C. s 13. The effect of the 1825 statute and its subsequent reenactments was, prior to 1967, to adopt a substantially uniform state law against abortion for application in federal enclaves. All fifty states had proscribed abortion. In all of them abortion was permitted in order to save the life of the mother. Only in Colorado and New Mexico was abortion permitted to prevent serious and permanent injury to the mother, and only in Alabama, Oregon, and Massachusetts was it permitted to protect the health of the mother.[1]

[1] See David Granfield, Id. at 79.

Thus, through the Assimilative Crimes Statute of 1825, the United States initiated a policy that made enforceable a substantially uniform policy directed against abortion in federal enclaves located within the fifty states of the nation. That policy by 1967 had been in existence for a total of 142 years. It was a policy, like that of the state criminal law for whose application it proveded in federal enclaves, that involved.

> "recognition of the human dignity of the unborn and the protection of unborn life by criminal sanctions." [1]

This congressional protection of the life of the unborn extending over a period of 142 years without variation under the Assimilative Crimes Statute constitutes one of the clearest legislative constructions of the appropriate use of its powers to protect federal interests within federal enclaves under the Constitution of the United States. It is a recognition that the unborn child is a human person, under the constitution, and that Congress has the authority under the 17th clause of Article I, Section 8 to provide for the protection of its right to life. The reenactment of the original Assimilative Crimes Statute on April 5, 1866, during the period of Congressional consideration of various civil rights measures and of the proposed Fourteenth Amendment, in light of the substantial number of statutes directed against abortion that had been enacted since 1825 suggests that the Congress saw this statute as, in part, a civil rights statute for the protection of the security of the person. In any event, this legislative construction of the Constitution was continued for a period of nearly double the 73 years of another legislative construction which this Court held, as previously noted, "fixes the construction" to be given its provisions."

Surely, if Congress and the Court are not free after 73 years of a consistent Congressional construction of the Constitution to change that Construction, several state governments are not free by enactment of unlimited or substantially unlimited abortion laws to change a congressional construction of 142 years standing that the unborn child is a human person deserving protection of its right to life in the exercise of the power to provide exclusive legislation for places ceded by the states to the United States. The 142 year old construction should surely "fix the construction" by Congress for the Congress, the State Legislatures, and this Court that the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

Congress and the Chief Executive have given numerous long standing as well as recent constructions of the Constitution recognizing the unborn child to be a person deserving protection by the United States for its life and health.

Prior to the enactment of the Uniformed Services Dependents' Medical Care Act of 1956 (70 Stat. 250, Title 10, U.S.C. ss 1071-1085), the dependent wives and children, both born and unborn, had been receiving medical care from the uniformed services for over 100 or more years despite the fact that there was no specific statutory authority for rendering this care until 1884 in the case of the United States Army and 1943 in the case of the United States Navy. Congressional Record Statement of Representative P. Kilday of Texas, Congressional Record, Vol. 102, 3847 (March 2, 1956). Medical care was provided dependents of the U.S. Navy and U.S. Marine Corps by the Navy, of members of the Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geordetic Survey by the Public Health Service, and of the U.S. Army and Air Force Personnel by the Army. These statutes gave virtually unlimited discretion to the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in providing medical care to members of these services and their wives and children.

The Uniformed Services Dependents' Medical Care Act of 1956 was designed to continue the long standing policy of providing medical care to dependent wives and children, both born and unborn, of members of the Uniformed services, but also to improve greatly the quality of medical care available, to make it more uniform in nature, and to make more readily available to the more than 40 per cent of all dependents who had not been able to take advantage of it due to the "shortage of military doctors, overcrowding of military medical facilities, (and the fact that)...so many of the military dependents are located where they cannot take advantage of existing military care." Congressional Record. Vol. 102, 3851-3853 (March 2, 1956).In its section 1072 (Title 10, USC) the term dependent was defined to include:

> "an unmarried legitimate child who has not passed his twenty-first birthday ...(or) is incapable of self-support because of mental or physical incapacity."

Section 1077 of Title 10 U.S.C. provided that only the kinds of health care specified in that section were authorized to be provided dependents of a member of a uniformed service. One of the authorized kinds of health care was "maternity and infant care." This phrase was further defined in joint regulations issued by the Secretaries of Defense and Health, Education, and Welfare who were required under Section 1076 to issue these regulations in order to prescribe in greater detain the medical care available under Section 1077. Joint regulations issued under the Act provided, by way of further definition of the statutory phrase "maternity and infant care", that the phrase include:

> "prenatal and postnatal care, and routine care and examination of the newborn infant." Title 32, Section 577.64 (e) (7).

Neither the Act nor the joint regulations issued under them referred to or authorized the latter but rather referred to the following health benefits, among others

"Drugs: Prescriptions written by either uniformed services or civilian physicians will be filled at uniformed services facilities...."

Family planning services and supplies, including counseling and guidance. These services and supplies will be provided in accordance with sound medical practice to any eligible dependent upon request. Title 32, Section 577.64(e)(3),(9).

The Congress that enacted this Act obviously was concerned with the welfare of mothers and unborn children. Congressman Paul Kilday, Chairman of the House Committee on Armed Forces Subcommittee No. 2 which conducted hearings on H.R. 9429 which became the new Act, made statements that typify the congressional mind in 1956 in discussing the right of dependent wives and their unborn children to obtain medical care under the statute from private physicians in private hospitals:

"A woman (military member's wife) expecting a baby has a number of friends who have recently had babies who knew the doctor who took care of them, and they knew everything came out all right and they naturally want to go to that doctor in the community...If they (military personnel) do not have quarters on the base, they are out in the civilian community where they meet the people and hear these things talked about.

"...the woman expecting her baby might go home in the sixth month of pregnancy. Most Texans do that. They want their kids born in Texas and they go home." Hearings before Committee on Armed Services, U.S. House of Representatives, Comm. Rep. 53, 84th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1956 6029, 6034.

Clearly, at this point, Congressman Kilday had reference to a new feature of the bill that would permit a serviceman's dependent wife to obtain medical care for herself and her child in a private hospital under the cognizance of state law. His statement not only reflects the concern of the legislators for providing medical care for the wife and the unborn child but also for the provision of this care in the context of a private hospital by a private physician subject to and controlled by the state law of abortion. In the particular example he gave, that law was the one now being challenged in this case. Congress at the time it enacted the Uniformed Services Dependents' Medical Care Act in 1956 was reaffirming its 100 year commitment to respect for the unborn child as a human person and seeking to provide for improved health care to be made available to it and to its mother. Having indicated this concern with the unborn child as a dependent entitled to medical or health care, Congress drove home the point by providing that no dependent should be denied equal opportunity for that care through requiring the Secretaries of Defense and Health, Education, and Welfare to issue joint regulations;

> "to assure that dependents entitled to medical or dental care under this section will not be denied equal opportunity for that care because the facility concerned is that of a uniformed service other than that of the member."[1]

Throughout the history of the administration of the 1956 Act the Uniformed Services continued to give effect to the Assimilative Crimes Statute policy of respecting the state law on abortion in federal enclaves. In July 22, 1970, the Surgeons General of the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force joined in a memorandum addressed to the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Health and Environment) taking the position that

"Abortions will be performed within the limits of local state laws."

On July 31, 1970 the Assistant Secretary of Defense, Louis M. Rousselot, M.D., F.A.C.S. issued a memorandum by way of reply to the joint memorandum of the Surgeons General of the Armed Forces stating, without citation of authority for his directive, disapproval of the above limitation on performance of abortions. He referred to his Memorandum of July 16, 1970, which also was without citation of authority, directing that > "Pregnancies may be terminated in military medical facilities when medically indicated or for reasons involving mental health and subject to the availability of space and facilities and the capabilities of the medical staff."

There was no authorization for this action either in the 1956 Act or any joint regulation issued by the Secretaries of Defense and Health, Education, and Welfare as required by that Act with respect to forms of health care to be available to dependents.

After the implementation of this new "memorandum" policy on abortion by the Secretary of the Air Force by Air Force Regulation 160-13 and its application in Texas at the Willford Hall Air Force Base Medical Center, Lackland Air Force Base located in San Antonio, Texas, and the destruction of more than 100 unborn children without compliance with the Texas law of abortion, the case of Paul B. Haring v. Commander Willford Hall Air Force Base, No. SA 71 CA 11 was instituted on January 15, 1971, before the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas. This case challenged the validity of these abortions and of the regulation under which they were being performed by virtue of Fifth, Eighth, and Ninth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.[1] A temporary restraining order against further abortion under the challenged regulation by the Court was, on Defendants' Motion to Dismiss, permitted to expire without extension as requested by the Plaintiff and the Defendants' Motion was granted on the ground that the plaintiff had not satisfied the Court on the legal question of having sufficient standing to bring the suit. The case is now on appeal before the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, docketed as No. 71-1404.

On April 3, 1971, following institution of and the decision in the Haring case, supra, the President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, issued a directive overturning the "memorandum policy" of the Assistant Secretary for Defense (Health and Environment) and the Air Force Regulation 160-12. He stated:

> "I have directed that the policy on abortions at American military bases in the United States be made to correspond with the laws of the states where those bases are located. If the laws in a particular state restrict abortions, the rule at the military base hospitals are to correspond to that law."...
> "From personal and religious beliefs I consider abortions an unacceptable form of population control. Further, unrestricted abortion policies, or abortion on demand, I cannot square with my personal belief in the sanctity of human life-including the life of the yet unborn. For, surely, the unborn have rights also, recognized in law, recognized even in principles expounded by the United Nations.

"Ours is a nation with a Judeo-Christian heritage. It is also a nation with serious social problems-problems of malnutrition, of broken homes, of poverty and of delinquency. But none of these problems justifies such a solution.

"A good and generous people will not opt, in my view, for this kind of alternative to its social dilemmas. Rather, it will open its hearts and homes to the unwanted children of its own, as it has done for the unwanted millions of other lands."[1]

The action of the President caused the health policy of the Department of the Air Force to be returned after a brief, unauthorized departure therefrom, to the traditional administration of health care by the armed forces of the United States in behalf of unborn children, a policy that had been unbroken in its administration between approximately 1856 and 1970, a total of 114 years. This, too, constitutes a long-continued Congressional and Executive construction of the Constitution of the United States as authorizing the exercise of federal power to protect the unborn child as a person in its right to life.

Congress has consistently between 1873 and 1971 maintained a vigorous policy against abortion by statutes specifically directed at the practice. One of these statutes, the District of Columbia Code provision section 22-201, was recently examined by this Court in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62 (1971). The Court held the statute, originally enacted in 1901, was not unconstitutionally vague insofar as it excepted from its coverage an abortion "for the preservation of the mother's life or health".

Congress has since 1873 prohibited the importation of any drug, medicine, or article for causing unlawful abortion. 17 Stat. 598-599 (March 3, 1873). It has also since 1876 prohibited the use of the mails for the support of operations to effectuate an abortion through the mailing of information concerning these operations. 19 Stat. 90 (July 12, 1876). These two laws are now contained in the United States Code, Title 18, sec. 1461 and Title 19, sec. 1305, respectively. When these laws were modified on January 8, 1971, so as to strike their coverage of the same matter relative to "the prevention of conception", Congress continued intact their policy relative to "unlawful abortion". Pub. Law 91-662. Thus, for nearly a hundred years Congress has directed two major statutes against vital avenues for effectuating "unlawful abortions" in areas subject to exclusive federal regulation. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in Bours v. United States, 22 Fed. 960 (C.A. 7, 1915) held that the word "abortion", as used in the predecessor to Title 19, section 1305, U.S.C.,

> "must be taken in its general medical sense. ... Therefore a physician may lawfully use the mails to say that if an examination shows the necessity of an operation to save life he will operate, if such in truth is his real position. If he uses the mails to give information that he elects, intends, is willing to perform abortions for destroying life, he is guilty, irrespective of whether he has expressly or impliedly bound himself to operate."[1]

Thus, for nearly a hundred years, Congress has directed two major statutes against vital avenues for effectuating "unlawful abortions", the latter being construed to mean any abortion not performed due to the necessity of an operation to save life. This action in regulating the use of the mails and the importation of goods into this country constitutes a third long-continued construction by Congress that the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the Constitution having a right to life which Congress has the authority to act to protect.

A more recent construction of the Constitution by Congress is represented by the Federal Tort Claims Act, Title 28, Sections 2671 et seq., U.S.C., which was enacted in 1948. This act gives the unborn child the right to recover for injuries inflicted upon them as a result of the negligent acts of federal officers and employees generally and of the uniformed services, including physicians when the latter are rendering medical care to them and to their mothers. In Sox v. United States, 187 F.Supp. 465 (D.C.S.C., 1960) the Government stipulated that it was liable for any injuries sustained as a result of the negligence of a military policeman by an unborn child during the sixth month of its mother's pregnancy and the child recovered the sum of $260,000 for those injuries which left her "completely helpless and entirely dependent upon others". In Rewis v. United States, 369 F. (C.A. 5, 1966) the Court held that in a tort action brought by the parents of a child for causing her wrongful death as a dependent treated by an Air Force Medical Officer that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to adduce specific testimony, as the trial court had rules was necessary, that "to a reasonable degree of medical certainty" the child's life could have been saved. This child was fifteen months old. These cases indicate that Congress is as concerned with protecting the unborn child as a person as it is with protecting other children from injuries inflicted by the negligent action of its own officers and employees.

Even more recently, Congress has show its concern with the efforts of some states to promote family planning by abortion. Section 1008 of the Family Planning Services and Population Research Act of 1870, signed by the President on December 24, 1970, provided:

"None of the funds appropriated under this title shall be used in programs where abortion is a method of family planning." Pub. Law 91-572, 84 Stat. 1504.

Thus, from 1825 to the present Congress has created not less than six major statutory policies all of which are directed toward treating the unborn child as a person and protecting its right to life and to freedom from invasion of its bodily integrity or privacy. All of these policies are still in force today. Some of the oldest of these have been reaffirmed as late as 1971. Others are newer policies that widen the area of protection for the unborn child such as those concerned with health care and redress for tortious invasions of its interests. One of these policies, that of health care for dependents of uniformed services' personnel originated in the Executive Branch of government and was later codified by an act of Congress. Taken together, this long-continued Congressional and Executive construction of the Constitution as contemplating the unborn child as a person and as authorizing these branches of government to provide protection of the life and other interests of the unborn child would seem to foreclose this Court from taking any other view in construing the constitutional safeguards of the person.

The fact that since 1967 several states have enacted abortion laws in basic conflict with this long-standing federal policy against abortion except for the necessity of preserving the life or avoiding a grave peril to the health of the mother does not, by operation of the federal Assimilative Crimes Statute, supra, undercut that policy.

This Court in United States v. Sharpnack, specifically reserved decision upon the point of the effect of the Assimilative Crimes Act

> "where an assimilated state law conflicts with a specific federal criminal statute, cf. Williams

v. United States, 327 U.S. 711, or with a federal policy. Cf. Johnson v. Yellow Cab., 321 U.S. 383; Stewart & Co. v. Sadrakula, 309 U.S. 94; Hunt v. United States, 278 U.S. 96; Air Terminal Services, Inc. v. Rentzel, 81 F. Supp. 611; Oklahoma City v. Sanders, 94 F. 2d 323."[1]

The position of amicus is that because of the long-standing and current pervasive federal policy against abortion as evidence in six major federal statutory areas and in the Constitution itself the Assimilative Crimes Statute does not operate to assimilate a state statute going beyond the grounds for abortion approved in federal statutes and policy.

F. Judged from the standpoint of what it is in itself, the unborn child is a person and justice demands that government recognize this fact and treat the unborn child for what it is.

Up to this point, the argumentation of amicus has been directed to application of the well-established criteria for interpretation of the Constitution. The final argument that the unborn child is a person focuses upon what the unborn child is in itself. The relevance of this argumentation is that all law, and especially constitutional law, is a method of accomplishing "justice according to the law". For this reason, it is important to determine what the child is itself. If the unborn child must be acknowledged to be a person, the justice demands that this Court construe the Constitution, especially with regard to the constitutional safeguards of the person, so that all government, both state and federal, is required to treat the unborn child for what it is. Justice has always been recognized to involve action, whether by an individual or private or public group, that accords to an other or others what is their due, what is due is what respects the dignity and needs of the person upon whom the action bears.

The classic definition of the person is that provided by St. Thomas Aquinas in his Summa Theologica. He defined the person as being "the individual substance of a rational nature."[1] By the notion of "individual substance" Aquinas meant that the person has an existence that is peculiar to itself and different and distinct from the existence of anything else, an existence that is not a part of the existence of another but an existence which belongs to it alone: e.g. we refer to "this particular man". By "rational nature" Aquinas had in mind "a reality of human nature. With reference to human being, the reality of human nature is the nature or principle within man that moves us to recognize man as being a different kind of being from other animals. Aquinas had in mind by this principle the cognitive and appetitive rational powers of man, which he discusses in the first part of the second part of his principal work.[2]

The unborn child at every stage of its development satisfies sufficiently the concept of the person. The unborn child is an individual substance, differing from its mother and having a life that is remarkably separate from, although obviously dependent upon, its environment even as the child who has just been born and man in all his stages is dependent upon his physical and social environment. The unborn child also possesses a rational nature in the sense that all that is to be present in him when born is already formed at an early period in the womb. Professor R. Ashley Montagu of Columbia University has referred to this latter in saying:

> "This means that a developing child is alive, not only in the sense that he is composed of living tissue, but also in the sense that from the moment of conception, things happen to him, even though he may be only two weeks old, and he looks more like a creature from another world than a human being--he reacts. In spite of his newness and his appearance, he is a living striving human being from the very beginning. [1]

It is undisputed that the conceptus, or new fetus, possesses at the moment of its formation the so-called genetic code, the transmitter of all the potentialities that make men human, something that is not present in either their spermatoozoon or ovum. [2]

> "Thus it might be said that in all essential respects the individual is whoever he is going to become from the moment of impregnation. He already is this while not knowing this or anything else. Thereafter, his subsequent development cannot be described as his becoming someone he now is not. It can only be described as a process of achieving, a process of becoming the one he already is. Genetics teaches that we were from the beginning what we essentially still are in every cell and in every generally human attribute and in every individual attribute." 1

With respect to the separateness of the unborn child from its mother, it has been observed:

"The child may be parasitic and dependent, but it is a functioning unit, an independent life... However visceral may be its temporary residence, however dependent it may be before birth--and for some years after birth--it is a living being, with its separate growth and development, with its separate nervous system and blood circulation, with its own skeleton and musculature, its brain and hearing and vital organs." 2

Following the implantation of the fertilized egg in the uterus seven or eight days after ovulation, the development into the human fetus and embryo is extraordinarily rapid. This development has been described by Dr. Andre Hellegers as follows:

"After this second week of pregnancy the zygote rapidly becomes more complex and is now called the embryo. Somewhere between the third and fourth week the differentiation of the embryo will have been sufficient for heart pumping to occur, although the heart will by no means yet have reached its final configuration. At the end of six weeks all of the internal organs of the fetus will be present, but as yet in a rudimentary stage. The blood vessels leading from the heart will have been fully deployed, although they too will continue to grow in size with growth of the fetus. By the end of seven weeks tickling of the mouth and nose of the developing embryo with a hair will cause it to flex its neck, while at the end of eight weeks there will be readable electrical activity coming from the brain. The meaning of the activity cannot be interpreted. By now also the fingers and toes will be fully recognizable. Sometime between the ninth and tenth week local reflexes appear such as swallowing, squinting, and tongue retraction. By the tenth week spontaneous movement is seen, independent of stimulation. By the eleventh week thumb-sucking has been observed and X rays of the fetus at this time show clear details of the skeleton. After twelve weeks the fetus, now 3-1/2 inches in size, will have completed its brain structure, although growth of course will continue. By this time also it has become possible to pick up the fetal heart by modern electrocardiographic techniques, via the mother."[1]

Dr. H.M.I. Liley, the pioneer of the medical science concerning the human fetus, which is called Fetology, has recently written concerning his observations of the unborn child through closed circuit ex-ray television:

"The fluid that surrounds the human fetus at 3, 4, 5 and 6 months is essential to both its growth and its grace. The unborn's structure at this > early stage is highly liquid, and although his organs have developed...(t)he head, housing the miraculous brain, is quite large in proportion to the remainder of the body and the limbs are still relatively small. ...(H)e is quite beautiful and perfect in his fashion, active and graceful. He is neither an acquiescent vegetable nor a witless tadpole as some have conceived him to be in the past, but rather a tiny human being as independent as though he were lying in a crib with a blanket wrapped around him instead of his mother."[1]

An eminent child psychologist concluded as early as thirty years ago that the development of the human fetus reflects a mental growth as early as the fourth week.[2] In the sixth to seventh weeks, the nerves and muscles of the unborn child work together for the first time.[3] By eight and a half weeks the child's eyelids and palms of the hands become sensitive to touch.[4] By the end of the twelfth week, each unborn child shows a distinct individuality in his behavior due to the difference in inherited muscle structure from one child to the next. His facial expressions for this reason are already similar to the facial expressions of his parents.[5] By the end of the twelfth week, the child can also kick his legs, turn his feet, curl and fan his toes, make a fist, move his thumb, bend his wrist, turn his head, squint, frown, open his mouth, press his lips tightly together.[1] At this point also "we may assert that the organization of his psycho-somatic self is now well under way."[2] From the twelfth to the sixteenth week, the child grows very rapidly, his weight increasing six times and his height to eight or ten inches as a result of his consumption of oxygen and food received from his mother through the placental attachment which is part of the child.[3]

In the fifth month, the baby's weight increases to one pound and his height to one foot. Hair begins to grow on his head, eyebrows, and eyes, his skeleton hardens, and his muscles become much stronger.[4] The baby sleeps and wakes just as it does after birth.[5] The child hears and recognizes his mother's voice.[1]

In the sixth month, the child develops a strong muscular grip with his hands, starts to breathe regularly, and can maintain respiratory response for twenty-four hours if born prematurely.[2] He has about a 10 per cent chance of surviving at this point.[3]

The human fetus or unborn child is just as much a patient of the physician as is the mother.[4] With new optical equipment, a physician can look at the amniotic fluid through the cervical canal and predict life-threatening problems that are reflected by a change in the fluid's color and turbidity.[5] The blood of an RH unborn baby can now be exchanged through use of a new image intensifier X-ray equipment and the placement of a needle through the abdominal wall of the mother into the abdominal cavity of the child. This not only makes it possible to save the life of the child but it also reveals that the child experiences pain and protests it just as violently as a baby in a crib and for this reason must be given sedation and pain relieving medication.[6] Recent work indicates that the unborn child who is diagnosed as failing to get adequate nutrition may be fed by the physician through introducing nutrients into the amniotic fluid being swallowed by the child.[1] The amniotic fluid surrounding the unborn child offers the physician a convenient and assessable fluid that he can now test in order to diagnose a long list of diseases, just as he tests the urine and blood of his adult patients.[2] Some of these diseases can be treated before birth.[3] The new science has now developed to the point that the fetus can now be partially delivered and, after giving it an exchange blood transfusion, the surgeon can return the unborn child to the amniotic cavity so that it can continue its intrauterine growth. This development during the past eight years indicates that "surgery on the fetus in utero is quite feasible, even in early pregnancy" and that "(p)renatal surgery may soon be tried against a variety of crippling or fatal ills that defy postnatal treatment."[4]

The scientific data just reviewed concerning the unborn child of human beings from the moment of and after its conception emphasizes its individuality; its functional unity; its independent life; its striving, developing nature; its containment of all that it will ever be essentially in every cell, in every generally human attribute, and in every individual attribute; its mental growth from as early as the fourth week after conception; its ability to move its legs, feet, toes, fists, thumbs, head, and lips by the twelfth week of its existence; its ability to hear and recognize its mother's voice in the fifth month of its existence; and its 10 per cent chance of surviving if it is born prematurely in the sixth month. Other scientific data shows the growing ability of medicine to diagnose and to treat successfully the diseases of the unborn child even to the extent of removing the child for the purpose of surgery and then placing it back into its mother's womb.

Surely the above scientific data warrants this Court in taking the position that the unborn child is "an individual substance of a rational nature." The characteristics of the unborn child which this data reveals amply supports the judgment long since universally made by our Founding Fathers and their citizen peers by the Common Law, by the philosophers of natural rights, by adherents to religious beliefs at the time the Constitution was adopted that the unborn child is a human person, a judgment since concurred in by long continued construction of the Constitution by the Congress and by the Chief Executive over a period of 146 years.

Certainly, at a minimun, the above scientific data plus the argumentation set forth previously in this point should move this Court to say that a prima facie case has been made that the unborn child is a human person. This Court has previously known when to construct rules of substantive law that employ the prima facie concept, as in United States v. Philadelphia National Bank, 374 U.S. 321 (1963). In that case, this Court was concerned with lightening the burden of proving under Section 7 of the Clayton Antitrust Act (15 U.S.C. s. 18) that the effect of a merger "may be substantially to lessen competition" in a relevant market. It created a test that if satisfied by the facts surrounding the particular merger would operate to establish that the merger was prima facie one the effect of which may be substantially lessened competition in the relevant market. The test was developed by this Court in light of what it characterizes as an "intense congressional concern with the trend toward concentration." Id. at 363. This Court selected certain percentages relative to market share resulting from a merger from which it would conclude that the merger was prima facie one that might produce the prohibited economic effect. It justified its selection of these percentages in light of prior adjudications under other phases of antitrust law. Applying these prima facie substantive rules in the Philadelphia Bank case, this Court observed:

> "There is nothing in the record of this case to rebut the inherently anticompetitive tendency manifested by these percentages." Id. at 366.

What this Court did in the Philadelphia Bank case is entirely instructive for what it should do in this case. Amicus has clearly demonstrated the considerations that warrant this Court in concluding that the unborn child is or at least prima facie is a human person within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States entitled to invoke or have invoked in its behalf by the state the constitutional safeguards of the person. If this Court is unwilling to hold that the unborn child is a human person, it should at least hold that prima facie it is a human person and that the burden should shift, for constitutional purposes, to those who assert the unborn child is not a human person to demonstrate that proposition. In record of this case and in the briefs of appellants there is nothing to rebut many considerations that argue so strongly in favor of treating the unborn child as a human person within the meaning of the Constitution. In fact, the appellants never addressed themselves to this point in any substantial way.

If this Court found it advisable to construct substantive rules employing the "prima facie" concept so as to put the burden upon those who have merged elements of an industry to demonstrate that they are not what these substantive rules indicate they are, surely it is advisable for this Court to construct substantive rules employing the "prima facie" concept so as to put the burden upon those who challenge the existence of the quality of person in the unborn child to show that that child is not a person. It must surely be advisable for this Court to do at least this much in view of the consequences for the unborn child of invalidating the state law of abortion that protects its life. Surely, the views of the Founding Fathers and their citizen peers, the Common Law, the philosophers of natural rights, and adherents to religious beliefs at the time the Constitution was founded plus the long continued construction of the Constitution by the Congress and the Chief Executive concerning the unborn child as a person within the meaning of the Constitution manifest a very "intense...concern" with preventing destruction of the unborn child and promoting its interests. Surely, the prior decisions of this Court concerning the law that is applicable as the rule for decision by federal courts in diversity cases alone warrants such an approach.

We need not and should not confine our analysis to the view of Americans or Englishmen, either historically or currently, concerning whether the unborn child should be viewed as a human person. In 1959 the United Nations adopted a "Declaration of the Rights of the Child" which constituted a supplement to its "Universal Declaration of Human Rights." Its preamble stated the reason for the supplementary declaration as being that

> "the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth." G.A. Res. 1836, 14 U.N. GAOR Supp. 16 at 19, U.N. Doc. A/4354 (1959).

In elaborating the rights of the child, the United Nations took the position that it should be protected against all forms of neglect cruelty and exploitation, enabled to grow and develop in health, and have provided both to im and to his mother,...adequate prenatal and postnatal care." General Assembly of the United Nations, "Declaration of the Rights of the Child."[1]

The result of the argument in subpoint F is that there is extraordinarily sound ground for holding that the unborn child is, when considered from the standpoint of what he is, in himself, a person and, in justice, entitled to be treated for what he is by this Court in administering the constitutional safeguards of that person. A consideration of modern scientific data concerning the unborn child confirms that he possesses the qualities or characteristics that philosophy has long since established as the hallmarks of the human person: "an individual substance of rational nature." This data in relation to the classic philosophic definition of the person serve to confirm the view taken by various significant sources at the time of the adoption of the Constitution; by the Congress and The Chief Executive in their long-continued construction of the Constitution; by the definition given to the concept of property in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments by this Court; by the construction given to Article III by this Court with respect to the rule for decision in diversity cases; by this Court's recognition of the reasonable authority of the State to protect the life and health of children; by this Court's placing of fundamental concepts, such as religion, beyond the authority of the State or Nation to define; by the State's common and statute law recognition of the unborn child as a person; and by the United Nations in its "Declaration of the Rights of the Child.

The argument under Point I would seem overwhelmingly to require this Court to hold the unborn child is a person within the protection of the Constitution. But, if amicus is wrong in this, that argument at the minimum would seem to require this Court to note that it establishes a prima facie case for holding the unborn child to be a person and is sufficient to put the burden upon the appellents which they have in no respect discharged either before the lower court or this Court, of demonstrating that the unborn child is not a person.

POINT TWO

THE UNBORN CHILD BEING A PERSON AND HAVING THE RIGHT TO LIFE WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS OF THE PERSON, THE STATE HAS THE DUTY OR THE RIGHT UNDER THE CONSTITUTION TO PROTECT THE LIFE OF THAT CHILD REASONABLY VIS-A-VIS ITS SINGLE MOTHER OR MARRIED PARENTS WHO DESIRE TO TERMINATE ITS LIFE. THE STATE OF TEXAS IN PROVIDING THAT ALL ABORTIONS PERFORMED OR PROCURED BY A PERSON FOR A PREGNANT WOMAN WITH HER CONSENT THROUGH ADMINISTRATION OF ANY MEANS WHATEVER IS A FELONY EXCEPT SUCH AN ABORTION PROCURED OR ATTEMPTED BY MEDICAL ADVICE FOR THE PURPOSE OF SAVING THE LIFE OF THE MOTHER HAS REASONABLY ACTED TO PROTECT THE RIGHT TO LIFE OF THE UNBORN CHILD WITHOUT UNREASONABLY AFFECTING THE RIGHTS OF ITS SINGLE MOTHER OR MARRIED PARENTS.

A. The state is faced with a difficult decision-making problem in resolving the correlative rights of the unborn child as a person and of its single mother or married parents, and its decision to protect the life of the unborn child through an abortion statute should be allowed to stand if it is a reasonable decision.

Once it is determined that the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the constitutional safeguards of the person, the state is no longer capable of standing neutrally by with respect to the treatment of the unborn child by its single mother, its married parents, or by a physician employed by them to destroy its life. This proposition is even more obviously true once the state has acted, as all states have long since done and all still do in one or more respects, to protect the life and other interests of the unborn child either in the civil law or the criminal law or, as is usually the case, in both areas. Because the unborn child is a person, the state is faced with the question of the extent to which it is required to protect the life and other interests of that person with reference to the due process and equal protection concepts as well as other constitutional safeguards of the person.

It must consider that, apart from giving permission to others to take the life of the unborn child being considered as state action in view of its prior action which may be tested as to its constitutional validity, such a permission will extend to agents and employees of the state in many circumstances so that state action will be involved directly with the carrying out of such a policy. The state must also consider what it may or should reasonably do to give effect to the desires of its citizens relative to the protection of the life and other interests of the unborn child and of the interests of the state in that child.

This Court has had occasion to consider the rights of parents vis-a-vis their children in a challenge to the constitutional validity of state statutes limiting those rights. For example, in Prince v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944), this Court was faced with the contention that a state statute precluding labor by a child of tender years in distributing religious tracts was a violation of its parent's constitutional rights to freedom of conscience and religious practice and to freedom to bring up its child in a religion. Recognizing that the rights asserted by the parent have a "preferred position in our basic scheme," Mr. Justice Rutledge in the opinion for the Court, spoke of the appropriate approach to be used in evaluating the constitutional validity of the state statute in question:

> "To make accommodation between these freedoms and an exercise of state authority always is delicate. It hardly could be more so than in such a clash as this case presents. On one side is the obviously earnest claim for freedom of conscience and religious practice. With it is allied the parent's claim to authority in her own household and in the rearing of her children. The parent's conflict with the state over control of the child and his training is serious enough when only secular matters are concerned. It becomes the more so when an element of religious conviction enters. Against these sacred private interests, basic in a democracy, stand the interests of society to protect the welfare of children, and the state's assertion of authority to that end, made here in a manner conceded valid if only secular things were involved. The last is no mere corporate concern of official authority. It is the interest of youth itself, and of the whole community, that children be both safeguarded from abuses and given opportunities for growth into free and independent, well-developed men and citizens. Between contrary pulls of such weight the safest and most objective recourse is to the lines already marked out, not precisely but for guides, in narrowing the no man's land where this battle has gone on."

Rejecting the position of Justice Murphy that any restriction of First Amendment freedoms must be treated by the Cout as "prima facie invalid" and as placing the burden on the state "to prove the reasonableness and necessity" of its regulation, 321 U.S. at 166, Mr. Justice Rutledge stated for the Court:

"It is cardinal with us that the custody, care and nurture of the child reside first in the parents, whose primary function and freedom include preparation for obligations the state can neither supply nor hinder. Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra (268 U.S. 510). And it is in recognition of this that these decisions have respected the private realm of family life which the state cannot enter.

"But the family itself is not beyond regulation in the public interest, as against a claim of religious liberty. Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145; Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333. And Neither rights of religion nor rights of parenthood are beyond limitation. Acting to guard the general interest in youth's well being, the state as parens patriae may restrict the parent's control by requiring school attendance, regulating or prohibiting the child's labor, and in many other ways. Its authority is not nullified merely because the parent grounds his claim to control the child's course of conduct on religion or conscience. Thus, he cannot claim freedom from compulsory vaccination for the child more than for himself on religious grounds. The right to practice religion freely does not include liberty to expose the community or the child to communicable disease or the latter to ill health or death. The catalogue need not be lengthened. It is sufficient to show what indeed appellant hardly disputes, that the state has a wide range of power for limiting parental freedom and authority in things affecting the child's welfare; and that this includes, to some extent, matters of conscience and religious conviction.

"A democratic society rests, for its continuance, upon the health, well-rounded growth of young people into full maturity as citizens, with all that implies. It may secure this against impeding restraints and dangers, within a broad range of selection. Among evils most appropriate for such action are the crippling effects of child employment, more especially in public places, and the possible harms arising from other activities subject to all the diverse influences of the street. ...

"The zealous though lawful exercise of the right to engage in propagandizing the community, whether in religious, political or other matters, may and at time does create situations difficult enough for adults to cope with and wholly inappropriate for children, especially of tender years, to face. Other harmful possibilities could be stated of emotional excitement and psychological or physical injury. Parents may be free to become martyrs themselves. But it does not follow they are free, in identical circumstances, to make martyrs of their children before they have reached the age of full and legal discretion when they can make that choice for themselves. Massachusetts has determined that an absolute prohibition, though one limited to streets and public places and to the incidental uses proscribed, is necessary to accomplish its legitimate objectives. Its power to attain them is broad enough to reach these peripheral instances in which the parent's supervision may reduce but cannot eliminate entirely the ill effects of the prohibited conduct. 321 U.S. at 166-170.

The decision in Prince should be viewed as concluding the appellants in this case, which from every standpoint is an a fortiori case relative to Prince. This Court there assumed that the child had a right to life that the state had a right to protect by legislation. Once it is decided that the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the constitutional safeguards of the person, the Prince decision means that it also has a right to life that the state has a right to protect by legislation. Moreover, appellants cannot rely upon First Amendment freedoms as did the appellant in Prince. Appellants do not present a case in which they are in good faith seeking to implement their own notions of what is for the welfare of their actual or future child. Instead, they seek to destroy or to obtain the right to destroy their present or future unborn child. The State of Texas has acted, as had Massachusetts, in "the interest of youth itself, and of the whole community, that children be safeguarded from abuses and given opportunities for growth into free and independent well-developed men and citizens." Indeed, the state has acted to prevent the parent from acting "to expose...the child...to...death," something this Court stated a parent has no right to do. 321 U.S. at 166-167. If this Court was willing to affirm a state's power, as in Prince, to preclude by statute a parent from exposing its child to "the crippling effects of child employment" including the harmful possibilities...of emotional excitement and psychological or physical injury" involved in soliciting funds for religious tracts being distributed, 321 U.S. at 169-170, it should be moved even more strongly to affirm a state's power to preclude a parent or another at its direction from destroying the life of the former's child. Certainly, under the Prince decision, the state in enacting and retaining the traditional form of abortion statute is entitled to the presumption in enacting and maintaining it. Indeed, in view of the difficult decision problem the state faces in balancing the competitive or correlative interests of the unborn child and of its single mother or married parents, this Court should be relatively reluctant to disturb the state's choice of what seems to it to be the appropriate solution, particularly when it can be so strongly supported as to its reasonableness as will be demonstrated below.

Federal District Courts in Louisiana and Ohio have sustained the right of the state under abortion statutes substantially identical to that of Texas to protect the constitutional right of the unborn child as a person to its life. Rosen v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 318 F. Supp. 1217 (E.D. La. 1970) and Steinberg v. Brown, 321 F. Supp. 741 (N.D. Ohio 1970).

Judge Young in the Steinberg case stated:

"Once human life has commenced, the constitutional protections found in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments impose upon the state the duty of safeguarding it.

"There is authority for the proposition that human life commences at the moment of conception.

> "Biologically speaking, the life of a human being begins at the moment of conception in the mother's womb. ...
> "From the viewpoint of the civil law and the law of property, a child en ventre sa mere is not only regarded as human being, but as such from the moment of conception...which it is in fact.

"If the law is in accord with science for the purpose of protecting property rights, how can it possibly not be in accord with science for the purpose of protecting property rights, how can it possibly not be in accord with science for the purpose of protecting life itself, without which no property right has any worth or value whatsoever." Id. at 746-747.

Judge Ainsworth of the Rosen case, supra, relied primarily in his opinion upon a proposition stated by Mr. Justice Holmes in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 76 (1905) (dissenting opinion):

> "The word 'liberty,' in the 14th Amendment, is perverted when it is held to prevent the natural outcome of a dominant opinion, unless it can be said that a rational and fair man necessarily would admit that the statute proposed would infringe fundamental principles as they have been understood by the traditions of our people and our law. ...We are not persuaded that the Louisiana abortion laws infringe any fundamental principle as understood by the traditions of our people. As an ethical, moral, or religious matter a woman's refusal to carry an embryo or fetus to term, both historically and today, has been condemned as wrong by a substantial, if not a dominant, body of opinion, except in very limited circumstances." Id. 318 F. Supp. at 1231.

Neither of the theories of decision employed in the Steinberg and Rosen cases is precisely the theory of decision urged by amicus upon this Court which is primarily based upon principles of constitutional interpretation and upon a judicial gloss upon the Constitution that indicate that the unborn child is a person and has a right to life protected by the Constitution. Nevertheless, amicus considers the theories of decision employed in the Steinberg and Rosen cases to be appropriate supportive theories for adoption by this Court in disposing of this case.

The courts in the Steinberg and Rosen cases also correctly anticipated the decision by this Court in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), holding the traditional type of state abortion statute t to be unconstitutionally vague. They also correctly plied this Court's decision in Griswold v. Connecticut, 1 U.S. 479 (1965) as the other federal district courts, cluding the lower courts, that have struck down the tra- tional type of state abortion statute, have not. Without y consideration of the issue of whether the unborn child s a person and without the constitutional safeguards of e person, including the Ninth Amendment, the lower court mply looked to the rights of single women and married uples and stated:

> "Plaintiffs argue as their principal contention that the Texas abortion Laws must be declared unconsitutional because they deprive single women and married couples of their right, secured by the Ninth Amendment, to choose whether to have children. We agree."
> "Since the Texas Abortion Laws infringe upon plaintiffs' fundamental right to choose whether to have children, the burden is on the defendant to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Court that such an infringement is necessary to support a compelling state interest. The defendant has failed to meet this burden." Roe v. Wade, 314 F. Supp. 1217, 1221-1222 (N.D. Tex. 1970).

milarly, the lower court in Doe v. Bolton, 319 F. Supp. 48 (N.D. Ga. 1970) stated after referring to the Gris- ld case, supra:

> "For whichever reason, the concept of personal liberty embodies a right to privacy which apparently is also broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy." Id. at 1055

ile the court in the Bolton case, supra, recognized at the parent's decision to abort affects others, it s unwilling to

"posit( ) the existence of a new being with its own identity and federal constitutional rights,.. 319 F. Supp. 1955

Taking a somewhat more cautious position than the lower court in this case, that court held that the state had a right to participate in the decision to abort and to treat the problem wholly "as a medical one," Ibid., but that the state had no right to "limit() the number of reasons for which an abortion may be sought." Id. at 1056. So far as the unborn child is concerned, the decision by the court in the Bolton case does not differ from the decision by the lower court in this case.

The position taken by the lower court below in the Bolton case has also been taken by several other courts. People v. Belous, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354,359 (S. Ct. Cal. 1969) cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970); Doe v. Scott, 321 F. Supp. 1385, 1389 (N.D. Ill. 1971) (appeal docketed sub nom. Hanrahan v. Doe, 39 U.S. L.W. 3438 (U.S. Mar. 29, 1971) (No. 1522, 1970 Term; renumbered No. 70-105, 1971 Term), stay issued (Marshall, J. Sup. Ct. Feb. 10, 1971) Doe v. Rampton, No. C-234-70 (D. Utah. 1970); and Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F. Supp 293, 301 (E.D. Wis. 1970) appeal dismissed for want of jurisd. 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam);

All of these cases, other than the Steinberg and Rosen cases, commit a fundamental error in constitutional law adjudication. They fail to confront and to decide whether the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the constitutional safeguards of the person, including the Ninth Amendment. For this reason, they also fail to confront and to decide whether the unborn child as a person protected by the Constitution has a constitutional right to life that the state may or must protect. Once these issues are confronted and resolved, as demonstrated above they must be in favor of the unborn child, then the whole framework of constitutional argumentation and decision changes. The Griswold case, supra, instead of being authority for these decisions is rather authority for their complete rejection.

The Griswold case concerned the validity of a state law that operated "directly on an intimate relation of husband and wife and their physician's role in one aspect of that relation." 381 U.S. at 482. That law proscribed use of a drug or instrument for preventing conception as well as any action assisting or counseling this use. The defendants, an officer and a medical director of a Planned Parenthood League, had been fined for instructing and advising a married couple as to means of preventing conception. The Court held the statute invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment because it was designed "to achieve its goals by means having a maximum destructive impact" upon the above human relationship and thereby "sweeping unnecessarily broadly and thereby invading the area of protected freedoms." 381 U.S. at 485. The particular sector of the area of protected freedoms involved in this case was the right to privacy of the husband and wife in an intimate relationship--described by the Court as a "zone of privacy" created by several fundamental constitutional guarantees, including the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments. Id. at 484-485. The Court emphasized that each of the specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights "have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance." Id. at 484. It was in this respect that the Court's reliance upon the general protective language of the Ninth Amendment took on special significance, suggesting that it might serve as the vehicle for these emanations. Its very content emphasizes that rights other than those specifically guaranteed exist and that there may be other important zones of privacy involving human relationships besides that existing between husband and wife.

The Appellants' heavy reliance upon the Griswold case, supra, could not have been a more misplaced one. Griswold is one of the principal cases supporting the position of the Appellee. It is a case which elaborates the theory of constitutional protection of privacy in human relationships. A human relationship involves human persons. One of the most vital of human relationships is that between the parent and the child, including the unborn child, and especially the relationship between mother and child. Nature has given the father an important initiative and supportive role in the relationship between parent and child. It has given the mother, however, the role of providing the temple in which the human life process starts upon conception with the embryo and unborn child rapidly developing thereafter and then growing in an orderly and wonderful fashion to the point when it is ready for birth. The unborn child is very much a human person, as previously demonstrated, and is a very important part of the relationship between parent and child. If there ever was a "zone of privacy" in human relationships that should generate and receive respect, it is that involved in the relation between mother and unborn child. The unborn child is by nature closed off in its mother's womb from the world and provided with the protection and assistance of the mother as it grows and as its bones, nervous system, brain, and organs, which develop at a very early date in the pregnancy, continue to develop. This privacy is essential to the maturing of the child and there is still no substitute for it throughout most of its period of development in the womb. Nature "intended" this privacy.

Surely, also, this is one of the most important "zones of privacy" to political society and required to be protected by it. It involves one of the most primordial and basic of the "privacies of life". The Supreme Court recalled in Griswold that "the Fourth and Fifth Amendments were described in Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616, 630 as protection against all governmental invasions of...the privacies of life." Id. at 484. It is the privacy of life that belongs to the unborn child, a human person before the law. Unless this zone of privacy--"the privacy of life" of an unborn child--is protected by either the terms of the Due Process Clauses of the Constitution which after all, directed toward protection of "life", or by its "penumbras" or those of other specific guarantees, or by the Ninth Amendment, nat child, the institution of the family, and political ociety itself are gravely threatened. The unborn child, n this event, cannot be born, become a citizen, enjoy he fellowship and love of the family, participate in olitical society by enjoying its benefits and bearing ts burdens, or realize upon its potential for self- ealization and contribution to others. The family in- titution becomes degraded through the insertion and ractice of violence against itself and one of its mem- ers although this violence and destruction is wholly nnecessary. Political society becomes endangered and the ommon good is sacrificed to the whim and caprice of usband and wife who seek, in the name of their own pri- acy and convenience, another's privacy of life who can- ot defend itself and who has done nothing to threaten hose who destroy it. It is this kind of result--the nvasion of privacy of the human person--about which riswold was very much concerned. That case necessarily emands, if the relationship between husband and wife s protected against invasion in its intimate aspects by the state, that the relationship between parent and child--and especially between mother and child--be pro- tected against invasion by its parent or parents or even by the state itself through an abortion.

What the lower courts failed to recognize in this and the Bolton case, supra, is the simple fact em- phasized by the courts in Steinberg and Rosen, supra:

> "Contraception, which is dealt with in Griswold, is concerned with preventing the creation of a new and independent life. The right and power of a man or a woman to determine whether or not to participate in this process of creation is clearly a private and personal one with which the law cannot and should not interfere.
> It seems clear, however, that the legal con- clusions in Griswold as to the rights of in- dividuals to determine without governmental interference whether or not to enter into the processes of procreation cannot be extended to cover those situations wherein, voluntarily or involuntarily, the preliminaries have ended, and a new life has begun. Once human life has commenced, the constitutional protections found in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments impose upon the state the duty of safeguarding it. 321 F. Supp. at 746.

"For the purposes of this case we assume, if we are not required to recognize, e.g.., Griswold v. Connecticut, 318 U.S. 479 (1965);.. that as a general matter women possess under our constitution a 'fundamental right' to determine whether they shall bear children before they have become pregnant. A state may interfere with this right of choice only in special circumstances. We deal in this case, however, not merely with whether a woman has a generalized right to choose whether to bear children, but instead with the more complicated question of whether a pregnant woman has the right to cause the abortion of the embryo or fetus she carries in her womb. We do not find that an equation of the generalized right of the woman to determine whether she shall bear children with the asserted right to abort an embryo or fetus is compelled by fact or logic... The basic distinction between a decision whether to bear children which is made before conception and one which is made after conception is that the first contemplated the creation of a new human organism, but the latter contemplates the destruction of such an organism already created. To some engaged in the controversy over abortion, this distinction is one without a difference....To others, however,... the difference between the decision not to conceive and the decision to abort is of fundamental, determinative importance. Thus the root problem in the controversy over abortion is the one of assigning value to embryonic and fetal life. 318 F. Supp. at 1222-1224.

Thus, once it is determined, as it must be that the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the constitutional safeguards of the person, the Prince and Griswold cases require this Court to sustain the good faith effort of the State of Texas to protect the life and other interest of that child by an abortion law, if that law is a reasonable one in its assessment of the competing interests of that child, its parents, and of the State itself.

B. The State cannot reasonably leave the fate of the unborn child to be decided by private persons such as the appellants in this case either with respect to whether an abortion is to be performed or with respect to the appropriate reason for an abortion. To do so would be an unconstitutional delegation of authority and a denial of equal protection of the laws guaranteed to the unborn child as a person protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.

If the state provided no statute for regulating the performance of abortions, it would be delegating unconstitutionally its authority to regulate the subject of abortions over to private persons. If this would be the case, this fact constitutes one of the major reasons for the reasonableness of state action in seeking to protect the constitutional right to life of the unborn child by some form of regulation of the subject matter of abortion. It is particularly fitting that when a state has been held to have violated the Fourteenth Amendment and the Ninth Amendment by the enactment of an abortion statute, that that state be judged in terms of federal standards as to the reasonableness of its actions in attempting to avoid an unconstitutional delegation of power to private persons who have challenged that statute and seek to assume the exercise of that power.

Justice Black in his dissent in Zemel v. Rusk, 381 U.S. 1 (1965) has articulated the kind of argument that is relevant to the point now being made with respect to an unconstitutional delegation of power. In that case, the question presented was whether, if the Secretary of State was statutorily authorized to refuse to validate passports of United States citizens for travel to Cuba, his authority was constitutionally permissible. Justice Black took the position that that authority was not constitutionally permissible since the subject matter was a law "restricting the liberty of our people." He stated:

> "Nor can I accept the Government's contention that the passport regulations here involved are valid 'because the Passport Act of 1926 in unequivocal words delegates to the President and Secretary a general discretionary power over passports....' That Act does provide that ' the Secretary may grant and issue passports, and cause passports to be granted, issued, and verified in foreign countries...under such rules as the President shall designate and prescribe.." Quite obviously, the Government does not exaggerate in saying that this Act 'does not provide any specific standards for the Secretary' and 'delegates to the President and Secretary a general discretionary power over passports'--a power so broad, in fact, as to be marked by no bounds except an unlimited discretion. It is plain therefore that Congress has not inself passed a law regulating passports; it has merely referred the matter to the Secretary of State and the President in words that say in effect, 'We delegate to you our constitutional power to make such laws regulating passports as you see fit.' The Secretary of State has proceeded to exercise the power to make laws regulating the issuance of passports by declaring that he will issue them for Cuba only to 'persons whose travel may be regarded as being in the best interest of the United States,' as he views that interest. For Congress to attempt to delegate such an undefined law-making power to the Secretary, the President, or both, makes applicable to this 1926 Act what Mr. Justice Cardoza said about the National Industrial Recovery Act: 'This is delegation running riot. No such plentitude of power is susceptible of transfer.' A.L.A. Schecter Poultry Corp. v United States, 295 U.S. 495, 553 (concurring opinion)....

"Our Constitution has ordained that laws restricting the liberty of our people can be enacted by the Congress and by the Congress only. I do not think our Constitution intended that this vital legislative function could be farmed out in large blocks to any governmental official, whoever he might be, or to any governmental department or bureau. Whatever administrative expertise it might be thought to have. The Congress was created on the assumption that enactment of this free country's laws could be safely entrusted to the representatives of the people in Congress, and to no other official or government agency. The people who are called on to obey laws have a constitutional right to have them passed only in this constitutional way." Id. at 21-22. (dissenting opinion)

Mr. Justice Douglas and Mr. Justice Goldberg concurred in the dissent of Justice Black. Id. at 23, 27. The Court in an opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Warren sustained the challenged statute on the ground that regard for the recent historical context in which it had been administered before its enactment indicated that area restrictions had been utilized by the Secretary of State. It is to be noted that in the Zemel case at least the basic statute drawn in question delegated to the Secretary of State the specific authority "to grant and issue passports, and cause passports to be granted, issued, and verified in foreign countries..." rather than only a more general authority such as "to provide for the interests of American Citizens relative to foreign travel." Moreover, as pointed out by the majority, there had been the administrative practice of utilizing area restrictions prior to the most recent reenactment of the statute.

The situation in which the state would be clearly placed if it repealed its abortion statute, however, would be quite similar to the situation which Justices Black, Douglas, and Goldberg believed the Congress to have been in after enactment of the statute challenged in the Zemel case. It would be in the situation of simply having turned over the protection of the right of unborn children relative to their lives to the uncontrolled discretion of their parents and the physicians they employed. It would simply be the situation referred to by both Justice Black in his Zemel dissent and earlier by Justice Cardoza in the Schecter case, supra:"

> "This is delegation running riot. No such plenitude of power is susceptible of transfer." 295 U.S. 495, 553 (concurring opinion).

Moreover, the "delegation running riot" would be operating in the context not of economic regulations of prices and wages by private groups but in the context of control of the constitutional right to life of unborn children by private persons. It seems clear that Justice Black would have been moved to say in the instant case that the State of Texas acts reasonably when it refuses to turn over such control to private persons over the most important right a person possesses, his right to life.

The situation in which the State of Texas would find itself should it not have some regulation of abortion on its statute books would be much more like the situation presented in the case of Kent v. Dulles, 357 U.S. 116 (1958). In that case it was contended that the statute authorized the Secretary of State to withhold passports to citizens because of their beliefs or associations. The same statute involved in the later Zemel case, supra, was the basis of this asserted authority. The claim of authority was challenged as an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power. Instead of reaching this constitutional issue, the Court wisely concluded that the statute did not delegate to the Secretary the kind of authority he had claimed. As in Green v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474 (1959), this Court was at pains to point out that it was the constitutional right to travel and to freedom of speech that was affected by the action of the Secretary for which he claimed statutory authority. In the opinion for this Court, Mr. Justice Douglas stated:

> "Since we start with an exercise by an American citizen of an activity included in constitutional protection, we will not readily infer that Congress gave the Secretary of State unbridled discretion to grant or withhold it....
> "And, as we have seen, the right of exit is a personal right included within the word 'liberty' as used in the Fifth Amendment. If that 'liberty' is to be regulated, it must be pursuant to the law-making functions of the Congress. And if that power is delegated, the standards must be adequate to pass scrutiny by the accepted tests. Where activities or enjoyment, natural and often necessary to the well-being of an American citizen, such as travel, are involved, we will construe narrowly all delegated powers that curtail or dilute them...Id. at 129.

In the situation we are now assuming the State of Texas to be as a result of acting to repeal its statute of abortion and replacing it with no statute, we are confronted with the right of a human person, the unborn child, to live, the right prior to, and the necessary foundation of, all other rights he may possess, including the right to travel. It is "life" rather than "liberty" or "property" that is at stake and this makes all the difference. If that "life" is to be regulated, indeed taken (assuming that it is constitutionally possible under some limited circumstances, "it must be pursuant to the law-making functions..." of the Texas Legislature. But, by hypothesis, the Legislature has turned over the power to control the life of the unborn child to private persons. Amicus suggests that the federal doctrine concerning unconstitutional delegations of legislative power demonstrate how reasonable the State of Texas has been in refusing to turn over the matter of whether to preserve the life of unborn children to private persons.

But the hypothetical situation we have been discussing is the situation that appellants want and that others like them have been able to persuade some federal district courts to provide them. The decision of the courts that have invalidated state laws of abortion and especially those that have denied the state any right to control the reasons for which an abortion may be performed, as in the Bolton case, supra, in effect are compelling the delegation of state authority to regulate the subject matter of abortions over to private persons without any standards whatsoever.

The State of Texas is acting reasonably in refraining from turning over power to regulate the subject matter of abortions to private persons for another reason, the prevention of a denial of equal protection of the laws to unborn children. If the state turned over control of the lives to unborn children to private persons in the form appellants seek and that others have obtained by the decisions such as that in the Bolton case, supra, this would permit the drawing of irrational and invidious distinctions between unborn children whose lives it permits to be destroyed by abortions with the mere consent of their parents, on the one hand, and the unborn children whose lives it protects so long as their parents have not consented to an abortion. This irrational and invidious distinction, based upon the bare consent of the parents of these unborn children, clearly is a denial of equal protection of laws to these citizens.

This Court in Levy v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 68 (1968) established the definitive approach to the problem of equal protection which the State of Texas has properly solved by its abortion statute. In that case a Louisiana statute was challenged as a denial of due process and equal protection of the law under the Fourteenth Amendment. That statute, which provided for a right to recover damages for injuries inflicted by another, was construed by the Louisiana courts as permitting the survival of the right to recover in favor of a child only if that child was a legitimate child. In holding this statute to be a denial of equal protection of the law, Mr. Justice Douglas in the opinion for the Court stated:

> "We start from the premise that illegitimate children are not 'nonpersons'. They are humans, live and have their being. They are clearly 'persons' within the meaning of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."
> "While a State has broad power when it comes to making classifications, it may not draw a line which constitutes an invidious discrimination against a particular class. See Skinner v. State of Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541-542. Though the test has been variously stated, the end result is whether the line drawn is a rational one.
> "We have been extremely sensitive when it comes to basic civil rights and have not hesitated to strike down an invidious classification even though it had history and tradition on its side. The rights asserted here involve the intimate, familial relationship between a child and his own mother. When the child's claim of damage for loss of his mother is in issue, why, in terms of 'equal protection,' should the tortfeasors go free merely because the child is illegitimate? Why should the illegitimate child be denied rights merely because of his birth out of wedlock. He certainly is subject to all the responsibilities of a citizen, including the payment of taxes and conscription under the selective Service Act. How under our constitutional regime can he be denied correlative rights which other citizens enjoy?

"Legitimacy or illegitimacy of birth has no relation to the nature of the wrong allegedly inflicted on the mother. These children, though illegitimate, were dependent upon her; she cared for them and nurtured them; they were indeed hers in the biological and in the spiritual sense; in her death they suffered wrong in the sense that any dependent would.

"We conclude that it is invidious to discriminate against them when no action, conduct, or demeanor of theirs is possibly relevant to the harm that was done the mother." Id. at 70-72

In the Levy case, the statutory right of illegitimate children to recover damages for an injury resulting in the death of their mother was at stake. In this case the even more important constitutional right to life of unborn children is at stake. These rights of the unborn children protected by the Texas statute also "involve the intimate, familial relationship between a child and his (or her) own mother." The rights protected by this statute also involve their relationship to the father, to other children of their parents, to the American political society, and to the whole human race. These rights also involve the relationship between the unborn child and the vast spectrum of common law, statutory, and constitutional rights that they have long since been recognized to possess and for which they are entitled to secure protection.

Most children are legitimate and their conception simply the most normal outcome of married life of their parents who now have had a change of mind about rearing children. Why should the unborn child be denied the right to life merely because his parents do not want the child? Why should this unborn child, a perfectly healthy human being waiting to be born, be subjected to the destruction of its life while another unborn child is not so subjected, the only basis for the vast difference in treatment of the two being the consent of one set of parents to the abortion and the non-consent of the other set of parents. The consent or non-consent of the two sets of parents has no relation to the alledged wrong inflicted on the mother or the two parents of the child; indeed, there is no possibility of alledging any wrong on the part of the unborn child. The consent or non-consent of the two sets of parents does not intrinsically relate to the chils or any problem it might be creating for its parent or parents. It is wholly connected with an evaluation of the right of the unborn child to its life and objective factors that might, under narrow circumstances, warrant the destruction of the child's life.

The recent case of Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969) provides additional guidance for the response to this question. In that case, the Court considered appeals from decisions of three-judge District Courts relative to a state or District of Columbia statutory provision denying welfare assistance to residents of a state or district who have not resided within their jurisdictions for at least one year immediately preceding their applications for such assistance. The assistance that had been applied for included assistance for dependent children (AFDC) and several of the applicants were pregnant at the time they filed their applications for assistance. The Court held these statutory provisions to be a denial of equal protection of the laws. Mr. Justice Brennan in the opinion for the Court, stated:

> "There is no dispute that the effect of the waiting-period requirement in each case is to create > two classes of needy resident families indistinguishable from each other except that one is composed of residents who have resided a year or more , and the second of residents who have resided less than a year, in the jurisdiction. On the basis of this sole difference the first class is granted and the second class is denied welfare aid upon which may depend the ability of the families to obtain the very means to subsist--food, shelter, and other necessities of life. .. appellees' central contention is that the statutory prohibition of benefits to residents of less than a year creates a classification which constitutes an invidious discrimination denying them equal protection of the laws. We agree. The interests which appellants assert are promoted by the classification either may not constitutionally be promoted by government or are not compelling governmental interests." Id. at 627.

Mr. Justice Brennan also observed that the traditional criteria for determining whether equal protection of the laws had been denied were not applicable:

> "Since the classification here touches on the fundamental right of interstate movement, its constitutionality must be judged by the stricter standard of whether it promotes a compelling state interest. Under this standard, the waiting period requirement clearly violates the Equal Protection Clause." Id. 638

Thus, the opinion of the Court pointed out that while a certain legitimate interest of the state or of the District of Columbia might be promoted by the legislation and thus "a rational relationship between the waiting period and these four admittedly state objectives" established, this was not sufficient to justify the classification. Instead, it must be shown that the classification s necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest. Pointing to one of the state or district interests, r. Justice Brennan observed:

> "Since double payments can be prevented by a letter or a telephone call, it is unreasonable to accomplish this objective by the blunderbuss method of denying assistance to all indigent newcomers for an entire year." Id. at 637.

Applying the rationale of the Levy and Shapiro ases to the instant case, it is necessary in order to justify the State of Texas turning over the control of bortions to private persons like the appellants, rather han retaining that control as it has in its present abor- ion law, to show that it is necessary to take the lives f unborn children in order to promote a compelling gov- rnmental interest. Otherwise, the state in turning over his control to private persons would be acting unconsti- utionally by denying to unborn children equal protection f the laws. Far from the burden being on the state to emonstrate it has a compelling state interest for limiting he right of single women and married couples to determine hether to abort their unborn children, the burden under he Levy and Shapiro cases would be on the state to demon- trate the compelling interest it has should it take legis- lative action that would submit the lives of unborn child- ren to the uncontrolled discretion of their parents and hysicians they employ. And amicus suggests that the bur- den that would have been on the state in such a situation s the burden that appellants properly face in the in- tant case. This Court cannot deny the right of the State f Texas to comply with its standards for determining what s necessary in order to respect the right to equal pro- tection of the laws of persons, including unborn children.

Thus, the action of the state of Texas in en- cting an abortion statute is eminently reasonable because t is designed not only to avoid an unconstitutional de- legation of power over one of the most fundamental of human rights to private persons, the right of life, but also to avoid invidious and irrational distinctions being drawn between unborn children and between those children and their parents, each considered in their status as human persons with respect to this right to life. Moreover, the appellants have not discharged their burden of demonstrating a compelling interest of the state that would justify the state giving permission to appellant single mother and appellant married couple to destroy or to direct the destruction of the lives of their children. Unless that can be done, this Court is not justified in holding the state has acted unreasonably in protecting these children under its abortion statute.

C. The affirmative, particular reasons that can be adduced in behalf of the Texas law of abortion demonstrate the reasonableness of the state legislative judgment to enact and maintain that law and they counsel extreme caution on the part of federal courts in declaring that state legislative judgment to be unconstitutional.

There are eight principal, affirmative reasons for the State of Texas to adopt and to maintain its law of abortion. Most of these have already been developed and are as follows: (1) the unborn child is a person within the meaning of the constitutional safeguards of the person; (2) the unborn child, as such a person, has the constitutional right to life; (3) the state has the right, if not the duty, to protect the constitutional right to life of the unborn child; (4) for the state to turn the control over the protection of the constitutional right to life of unborn children to private persons, such as appellants, would result in an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power and in the drawing of invidious and irrational distinctions by these private persons between unborn children and between unborn children and other persons, such as the appellants; (5) the state has an interest in protecting the continuation of the body of persons and citizens forming the human element of families and of political society itself; (6) the state has an interest in preventing destruction of innocent human life where no adequate reason exists for that destruction in order to prevent the citizenry from becoming habituated to violence as a mode of social control and insensitivity to the value and the dignity of the human person; (7) in light of all the above reasons, the state has a compelling governmental interest in protecting the constitutional right to life of the unborn child absent a showing, in individual cases upon the basis of individual data, that there is a compelling governmental interest that overrides the former compelling governmental interest; and (8) there has been no persuasive demonstration of any compelling governmental interest by persons in the position of appellants that would warrant the state turning over to private persons the power to make decisions as to whether or not, and for what reasons, unborn children should continue to enjoy their constitutional right to life or that would warrant the state in extending the grounds upon which abortions could be secured by persons such as appellants.

Only the sixth and eighth reasons set out above for adoption and maintenance of the Texas law of abortion will be discussed here since the others have already been sufficiently developed.

The twentieth century has more and more frequently been described as a century in which violence and brutality have been promoted psychologically and as a technique for achieving social goals. For the National Socialists war became a way of life for the German government, a way of achieving national goals irrespective of the lack of justice in those goals or the methods used. Within Germany itself and in countries it occupied it addressed itself to the sordid task of destroying in gas ovens and by other means some 6,000,000 innocent men, women and children, including the unborn, of the Jewish faith on the view expressed by Hitler that the Jew deserved extermination as an "anti-man" or "unperson". Many additional millions of jews and eastern European peoples were seized in their homelands, without respect for family units, and committed to slave labor in Germany. Even the judicial system itself was converted into a technique of violence by German judges against German citizens in which the hard-won procedural guarantees respected elsewhere throughout Western Society were cast aside and adjudication was converted into a technique of murder, false imprisonment, and extortion. This story has been thoroughly elaborated in such trials as the Nuremburg Justice Trial, United States v. Josef Alstoetter, et al., (United States Military Tribunal No. III, 1947). and in books such as that of William L. Shirer.[1] In the Soviet Union the Communist regime utilized methods of collectivization of farms and industrialization in its autonomous republics that equally thorough and ruthless. Genocide was practiced against whole peoples. National cultures were destroyed. Groups of people were forced to migrate from their home areas to other republics. Millions of persons died in the process of enforcement of a policy of starvation in farm areas while the survivors were taken from their lands and placed in slave labor camps. All who opposed the program of the Communists in the Soviet Union were destroyed or effectively disabled by arbitrary means from causing trouble.[2] In our own country, we have seen an extraordinary increase in the pervasiveness of organized crime, whose leaders have undertaken new forms of violence for the achievement of their unjust ends since World War II. Careful students of our culture, such as Max Lerner, state that "America today, as in the past, presents the picture both of a lawless society and an overlegislated one." [3] Organized crime represents a idespread phase of what Lerner terms the ruthlessness of ur society. More recently, as a kind of disillusionment as set in among minority groups and the young following he hopes entertained in the early 1960's for solving ome of our country's persistent problems, there has ccurred an elaboration and action upon philosophies of iolence that in their extreme forms have included kid- apping, killing, and maiming of the innocent; the des- truction of property; the effort to disparage and disrupt he orderly administration of justice in our courts; and pposition to the entire system of what we have deemed to e the "free and democratic society." [1] What has been so triking about the philosophers of violence, as one able bserver has stated,

> "is the extraordinary degree of certainty by which it is inspired: certainty of one's own rectitude, certainty of the correctness of one's own answers, certainty of the accuracy and profundity of one's own analysis of the problems of contemporary society, certainty as to the iniquity of those who disagree. [2]

A member of this Court was moved to observe with respect to this emerging philosophy:

> "Violence is never defensible-and it has never succeeded in securing massive reform in an open society where there were alternative methods of winning the minds of others to one's cause and securing changes in the government or its policies." [3]

Many have felt that the American involvement in a series of wars throughout the twentieth century, and especially in the Viet Nam war, have been contributing to a breakdown in the high regard for the value of human life among Americans.

It would seem most evident, in the context of this violent generation, one which lives with the daily possibility of all-out nuclear warfare capable of wiping out most of mankind in a thirty minute period as we are told, the State of Texas cannot be charged with acting unreasonably when it has continued to maintain its law of abortion on its statute books for the same purposes for which it was enacted: the protection of the constitutional right to life of innocent unborn children who are unable to defend themselves against parents who would destroy them although the life of the mother is not in danger and there are reasonable alternatives both before the conception of that child or after its birth for avoiding the burden of rearing children. The State of Texas can reasonably say of those who seek the power to control the matter of abortion, as part of their constitutional right of privacy, what Michael Novak has said of certain other groups:

> "Prophetic minorities in history commonly rectify a balance by holding to one clean line; and in doing so they cast a lovely light. But they are inclined to be inhuman, to move upon too narrow a base, and to falsify human possibilities by prematurely foreclosing them." [1]

Several typical arguments have been made in support of invalidating state statutes on abortion like that of Texas. They have been in legislative halls across the country, including those of the Texas Legislature during its 1971 session in conjunction with the proposal of one of the most unlimited forms of liberalized abortion statutes.[1] They are far from persuasive and demonstrate the reasonableness of the Texas Legislature in adopting and continuing to maintain its present law on abortion.

The typical arguments are listed below and a sufficient comment upon them given to support the reasonableness of the Texas Legislative judgment in adopting and maintaining its present law on abortion. Amicus has relied principally upon the discussion of these arguments contained in the works of two distinguished authors, Daniel Callahan of the Institute of Society, Ethics and the Life Sciences and David Granfield, Professor of Law, Catholic University School of Law.[2]

> Argument One: The grounds for abortion should be extended to include psychiatric reasons in order to prevent the mother from carrying out a valid suicide threat which endangers her life.

Callahan reports upon numerous careful studies that indicate a consensus upon the following proposition: that suicide following rejection of an application for abortion is "very rare", "often used to blackmail psychiatrists," and "the pregnancy is not the most important cause of her emotional distress."[3] He further points out where there is a "liklihood of a severe neurosis or psychosis as a result of a pregnancy carried to term, the general opinion seems to be that only in the rarest cases would supportive therapy be totally useless."[1] He also reports that psychiatrists and many authorities feel that "there exist alternative ways of handling these difficulties other than by abortion."[2] Callaghan also records the lack of any sort of a consensus among psychiatrists "on fixed and clear norms for psychiatric indications for abortion."[3]

Dr. Theodore Lidz, Yale Professor of Psychiatry, has observed:

> "If we wish to have the laws concerning abortion changed, wishing to do away with that which seems hypocritical at present, let us be honest and seek to have the burden of such decisions left with the parents and not make judges out of doctors. The doctor is burdened enough trying to preserve life without getting involved in questions of when to terminate it. Indeed, it is a burden of modern man that so much is to be resolved by conscious choice unguided by ethical code. One may feel at times that whatever gods may be laughing in their far-off heavens at the dilemma of man who, through seeking to control nature and bring more and more out of the realm of contingency and under human control, has managed to become increasingly perplexed, confused, and self-destructive. There is a law concerning therapeutic abortion and it seems to me that, although such rigid limitation provokes us at times, such laws are a benefit to physicians, protecting them from the need to make impossible decisions--decisions that often go beyond their knowledge."[1]

Clearly, in this state of knowledge about "psychiatric reasons", the Texas legislative judgment in refusing to extend the grounds for legal abortion to include "psychiatric reasons" is most reasonable. There is little evidence to show that the neuroses or psychoses of pregnant women represent a significant danger to their lives comparable to the certainty of death for unborn children in abortion. Moreover, there are modes of treatment and confinement to protect pregnant women from their own defect or illness that might lead to suicide.

Argument Two: The grounds for abortion should be extended to include fetal indications for abortion such as "where there is a sensitization to the Rh factor, where the fetus has been exposed to a dangerous amount of radiation, where serious hereditary defects are likely to be present and cause genetic abnormalities; where harmful drugs (such as thalidomide) which have a high liklihood of producing fetal defects have been taken during pregnancy; and, finally, where the mother has contracted viral infections, particularly rubella."

Amicus has earlier pointed out the development of the new science of Fetiologyand the present ability of the science to employ exchange transfusion techniques. In addition, Callaghan indicates that there is now a gamma-globulin injection which forestalls Rh complications from the outset. With respect to radiation,Callaghan reports that data on the dangers involved from radiation are incomplete and there is no establishment of the certainty that each child born will be defective.

[1]Theodore Lidz, as cited in Harold Rosen, Therapeutic Abortions, Medical, Psychiatric, Legal, Anthropological, and Religious Considerations. N.Y.: Julian Press, 1954. 278

Granfield states that "the current prediction rate in the area of genetic fetal abnormalities is very limited."[1] There are a number of constructive steps that can be taken rather than legislating these children out of existence: support for the family in need of it to care for the defective child; support for medical and scientific research that has proved in this century its ability to deal very effectively with both childhood defects and diseases; and provision of facilities and facilities for the rehabilitation and education of defective children.

Where the child defect is feared because of the taking of a harmful drug, such as thalidomide, the obvious first answer is that government must take care through tests and experiments to assure that harmful drugs likely to cause child defects do not come on the market. Beyond this is the fact that the particular child defect resulting from a drug, such as thalidomide, does not justify destroying the life of the child. The main defect resulting from the taking of thalidomide by expectant mothers was the absence of various limbs. The defect can be dealt with through rehabilitative techniques. The child is otherwise a perfectly normal human being. Moreover, the danger of having a defective child was only considerable as result of the mother having taken thalidomide. To authorize the destruction of all children where the mother has taken such a drug is to authorize the destruction of not only an innocent life but in many cases also a perfectly sound one. Again, the same measures that were recommended with respect to genetic fetal abnormalities are good alternatives here. It is entirely defensible also that government which has failed to conduct adequate testing so as to result in harm doing drugs should be held responsible in damages to affected parents and children. Callaghan states that the most frequent child defect most frequently urged as a basis for extension of the grounds for abortion is the situation where the mother has contracted rubella.[2]

[1]Granfield, supra at 116.

[2]Callaghan, supra at 93.

Here, again, science has provided an adequate answer. There is now an effective vaccine against the disease and its incidence will likely drop greatly in the future.[1] Moreover, there is a strong liklihood that the mother who has contracted rubella will have a normal child or that the child will have only minor defects that can be corrected.[2] Beyond all this, no more than 15 percent of women capable of bearing children are subject to contracting rubella at all. [3] This seems scant justification, if there ever was any, for urging that grounds for abortion be extended to cover child defects in the situation where the mother has contracted rubella. Finally, the same efforts should be taken by the community to provide support for the family with defective children, and to provide facilities for the rehabilitation and education of these children.

One thing neglected in the above analysis is the viewpoint of the child with a defect at birth resulting from any of the above listed causes. That child is the person who has the constitutionally protected right to life. Its view and that of the community should be considered with respect to the worth of its life rather than the parents view as to the financial and other difficulty placed upon them of raising such a child. The burden of proof should be and is on the latter to prove that there is a compelling governmental necessity for authorizing the destruction of the child, who is after all a human person. As the Court observed in Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254, 264-265 (1970), where it was contended that countervailing governmental interests in conserving fiscal and administrative resources warranted terminating welfare assistance payments without a hearing:

> "The interest of the eligible recipient in uninterrupted receipt of public assistance, coupled with the State's interest that his payments not be erroneously terminated, clearly outweighs the State's competing concern to prevent any increase in its fiscal and administrative burdens.

"The crucial factor in this context...is that termination of aid pending resolution of a controversy over eligibility may deprive an eligible recipient of the very means by which to live while he waits."

Similarly, if the principal argument that appellants can make in their own behalf against the Texas statute on abortion as being unreasonable for not permitting abortion where the child may be born with a defect from any of the previously listed causes is that caring for the child will place financial and other burdens upon them, the Texas legislative judgment must be sustained as a reasonable one. The value of human life and its continuance is too precious to warrant crediting such an argument. Children born with defects can be assisted in many ways and so can their families. Many of the causes of these defects are already controllable. When children with defects are born from these causes, they can be provided with services of rehabilitation and education.

Argument Three: The grounds for abortion should be extended to include a pregnancy resulting from forcible rape and incest.

The argument made in favor of this ground is lacking even the support that pro-abortionists can bring to bear in favor of abortion in the first two arguments. In many instances, if not most, there will be no possibility of urging that there is a psychiatric reason or a probable child defect as a justification for the abortion. The basis for urging that the Texas legislative judgment in not allowing this ground for an abortion is unreasonable must be that the child is unwanted and will create various kinds of burdens for the mother or the mother's family.

No one can fail to have the deepest sympathy for the woman or teenager who becomes pregnant as a result of forcible rape or incest. But at the center of the problem for the community is the existence of a perfectly healthy and probably normal unborn child who is innocent of any wrong doing and as a human person has the constitutional right to life. With recognition of and committment to the unborn child as a human person, there is only one answer which a reasonable political society and its government can give to this problem: the protection of the life of the unborn child.

The first pertinent observation is that life in civilized society involves some risk. Daily we experience the commission of crimes against both the person and property. We also witness the ravages which automobile accidents inflict upon the health and lives of our citizenry. And we have lived through years of large and small wars with the weekly reports of the dead and wounded among our young men. Society has not been without resources, although it has been frequently tardy in utilizing them, for overcoming these risks and dealing with the facts of death and injury. So, too, in the case of forcible rape and incest that results in pregnancy, there are societal measures that are being taken and can be taken to protect against these invasions of bodily integrity and respond to the problems which they engender for the woman or teenager who becomes pregnant as a result.

Granfield observes greater efforts by the community at providing information about birth control, sex education, and caveats about behavior in certain social and physical contexts likely to subject a woman to attack provide a first kind of alternative to destruction of the unborn child.[1] They at least are directed at the cause of the rape whereas abortion following rape will neither undo the rape nor prevent others from occuring.

[1]Granfield, Supra at 209

While forcible rape cases represent less than one per cent of the total of nearly 3,000,000 serious crimes in the country annually, and while perhaps no more than 5% of the 23,000 forcible rape cases annually result in pregnancy, the problem is a serious one for the woman affected. While there exist Child and Family Services in Texas and other states that provide special care for pregnant women in a situation of indigency or emergency, undoubtedly these states should undertake greater measures to provide for their problems. Both counseling and financial assistance should be provided in sufficient amounts. The Texas State Department of Public Welfare already provides a wide range of services for children and their mothers which includes the unmarried mother.[2]

There apparently are medical means increasingly becoming available to prevent progress of the pregnancy by forestalling nidation or implantation such as the administration by a physician of an appropriate dosage of estrogen to the victim of forcible rape. Norbert J. Mietus has stated:

> "This procedure is not regarded as abortion and many doctors, with support from some moral theologians, argue that it is defensible because no direct attack is directed against the potentially fertilized ovum. Other observers and the author would argue that biologically and legally, if conception has occurred, only morally questionable sophistry could justify the action which thwarts the normal development of the existing life. However, it is possible that the estrogen acts somewhat in the manner assumed to be true of the IUD (intra-uterine device): to speed the journey of the female ova through the Fallopian tubes too rapidly to be fertilized." 1

Amicus specifically refrains from joining in any advocacy of the use of estrogen. The purpose of mentioning its potential usage is simply to indicate that medical science is devoting its research efforts to methods of avoiding pregnancy that may be quite responsive to the problem of the woman or teenager subjected to a forcible rape. Undoubtedly, a science that could develop the "pill" can discover means of preventing pregnancy following a forcible rape.

In light of the foregoing, the Texas legislative judgment of refusing to extend the grounds for abortion to cases of pregnancy resulting from forcible rape or incest seems quite reasonable.

Since every child resulting from a forcible rape is illegitimate where, as is usually the case, its parents do not marry each other, one necessary societal stel, as Granfield suggests, is reform the existing discriminatory laws against illegitimates. In Texas, for example, there is no requirement that the father support his illegitimate child. There are also problems for the illegitimate child with respect to inheritance, name, custody, and welfare assistance laws. Rationalizing this law vis-a-vis the illegitimate will materially assist to lessen the burden upon the woman or teenager of carrying to term the unborn child who is the product of a forcible rape. 2

In light of the foregoing consideration, the Texas legislative judgment of refusing to extend the grounds for abortion to cases of pregnancy resulting from forcible rape or incest seems quite reasonable.

Argument Four: Liberalized abortion laws would greatly reduce the number of illegal abortions.

The author of the California Therapeutic Abortion Act estimated that this law would legalize no more than 5 per cent of what may now be illegally performed abortions.[1] Granfield reports upon the studies of Scandinavian-type abortion legislation which shows that instead of illegal abortions being eliminated, which was one of the purposes of the legislation, they have actually increased. This is true of all the Scandinavian countries.[2] Thus, this argument seems hardly to warrant an attack upon the reasonableness of the Texas legislative judgment in maintaining its current abortion law as being the source of illegal abortions unless the position of appellants is that Texas cannot constitutionally control the reasons for which abortions are performed, the position taken concerning Georgia in the Bolton case, supra, a position that seems wholly unsupportable for reasons developed earlier.

One of the positive reasons for not extending the grounds for abortion beyond that of preserving the life of the mother is that there is considerable evidence that the performance of abortions still involves considerable danger to the mother. All of the current methods utilized for performing abortions are thoroughly reviewed by Callaghan. While most recent literature is less pessimistic about the dangers of induced abortion, there are physicians and scientists of distinction who take the position that abortions performed even by skilled physicians are more dangerous than the public and many doctors realize.

[2]Granfield, supra, at 89-90

allaghan quotes R. R. MacDonald with respects to the dangers involved in abortions performed after the tenth week:

> "By that time the cervix has softened appreciably and the uterus is palpable abdominally, globular in shape, soft and vascular. Dilation and curettage is quite likely to cause traume to the cervix and, even with drugs to make the uterus contract, there is usually a lot of bleeding, while perforation of the uterine wall is surprisingly easy. Abdominal hysterotomy may be necessary to empty the larger uterus. This can be quite difficult and there is the extra hazard of the abdominal incision. Hypertonic glucose or saline injected into the amniotic cavity kills the fetus and induces uterine contraction quite quickly. This gives the impression of being an elegant method of inducing abortion when the uterus has reached 16 weeks' size, but in fact quite a few deaths have occurred from pelvic infection and cerebral hemorrhage...A British urologist reported (Feb., 1967) after a visit to a kidney unit in Rumania that 300 patients had been admitted to the unit with renal failure following septic abortion.[1]

It would appear that Texas legislative judgment is reasonably supportable from the point of view that it confines abortion to those unavoidable situations involving the necessity for preserving the life of the mother although considerable danger may be involved for the mother from the abortion itself.

Finally, it should be observed that the Texas law of abortion is not without a reasonable scope for protecting the life and death of the mother. There has not been extensive adjudication covering the meaning of the exception to the traditional abortion laws permitting, as in Texas, an abortion "by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." What cases have construed such provisions are clear that these statutes give considerable scope to a physician in making a good faith judgment that an abortion is necessary in order to save the life of the mother and even to avoid a grave impairment to her health. As the Supreme Court of Iowa stated in State v. Dunklebarger, 206 Iowa 971 (1928):

> "In order to justify the act of Dr. Wallace (the defendant), it was not essential that the peril to life should be imminent. It was enough that it be potentially present, even though its full development might be delayed to a greater or less extent. Nor was it essential that the death of the patient would be otherwise certain in order to justify him in affording present relief.
> "Inasmuch as the question of necessity can ordinarily be determined only by medical opinion, it follows naturally that a physician, who examines a patient, must form an opinion in good faith, and must act upon it in like good faith. It follows also that if a regular physician does make an examination , and does act upon it, he is entitled to the presumption of correct judgment and good faith until the contrary be proven. 221 N.W. at 596, 594.

The Supreme Court of Oregon in State v. Buck, 200 Or. 87 (1953) stated:

> "The relief of a woman whose health appears in peril because of her pregnant condition attains the same importance as the necessity 'to preserve the life of such mother'." 262 P.2d at 502.

The result reached in the Buck case was based upon the Court's construing together the state's Criminal Abortion Act and its Medical Practice Act as if they were one act. The latter act had characterized as "unprofessional" and "dishonorable"

> "The procuring or aiding or abetting in procuring an abortion unless such is done for the relief of a woman whose health appears in peril after due consultation with another licensed medical physician and surgeon." 262 P.2d at 500.

These two cases indicate that there is considerable room for addressing the traditional abortion statute to a wide variety of situations involving the necessity of preserving the life of the mother or avoiding a grave peril to her health.

The choice that Texas has made in favor of permitting only such abortions as there seems quite reasonable in light of its proportioning the death of the unborn child to act of a physician or another on the basis of medical advice in performing an abortion deemed necessary in good faith in order to preserve the life of the mother or to avoid a grave peril to her life. Its reasonableness is based not only upon that proportion but also upon the status of both the unborn child and the mother as human persons protected by the constitutional safeguards of the person and the necessity for the state to regard the status and condition of both the mother and child. Its reasonableness is based further upon the inadequacy or lack of persuasiveness of the reasons urged for extending the grounds for abortion to those urged by appellants and others like them. It reasonableness is based finally upon the still considerable danger to the mother of abortions at various stages according to the assertions of able physicians and scientists.

POINT THREE

SINCE THE UNBORN CHILD IS A PERSON AND HAS A A RIGHT TO LIFE PROTECTED BY THE FOURTH, FIFTH, NINTH AND FOURTEENTH AMENDMENTS, IF THIS COURT SUSTAINS THE LOWER COURT DECISION THAT ARTICLES 1191-1194 AND 1196 OF THE TEXAS PENAL CODE ARE UNCONSTITUTIONAL AND TO BE GIVEN NO FURTHER OPERATION, THIS COURT MUST ALSO RENDER A DECISION STATING THE GROUNDS UPON WHICH ABORTIONS MAY CONSTITUTIONALLY BE SECURED OR PERFORMED AND PROVIDE OR DESIGNATE THE TRIBUNALS FOR ADMINISTRATION OF THOSE STANDARDS IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF BOTH SUBSTANTIVE AND PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS AND EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS UNDER THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, AND, SINCE IT IS FEDERAL ACTION THAT CREATES THE HAZARD FOR UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE FOURTH, FIFTH, AND NINTH AMENDMENTS.

In Point One, amicus has demonstrated that the unborn child is a person and has a right to life protected by the Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. Amicus also has demonstrated in its Point Two that the Texas legislative judgment in establishing and continuing to maintain its law of abortion is clearly a reasonable one in light of the reasons for its adoption and the unpersuasiveness of the reasons offered by appellants and others for changing it. Should, however, this Court hold that, for some reason, the Texas law of abortion is unconstitutional and is to be given no operation, as the lower court has held, then this Court, as has the lower court, will have by federal action placed in jeopardy the rights of the unborn child to life, which, it is assumed for the purposes of this point, this Court is willing to hold is protected by the Constitution.

The federal judicial action assumed for discussion in this point would leave the right of the unborn child to life unprotected by state criminal law and, for all practical purposes, by much, if not all, of its civil law. Without this protection, the federal judicial action would, in effect, be delegating over to private persons, such as the appellants, control over the unborn child's right to life. Unless this Court, in such event, provides standards to be observed before abortions may be performed by private persons and provides or designates tribunals for administration of those standards, it is the contention of amicus that this federal judicial action would be violative of the rights of the unborn child protected by the Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments.

It is well established that the action of a court is either state or federal action that can be violative of constitutional limitations upon government. Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948); cf., Hurd v. Hodge, 334 U.S. 24 (1948) and Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497 (1954). Even though this Court is the final arbitrer of what the constitutional protections of the person are, it is, of course, obvious that it is subject to constitutional limitations with respect to the method by which it implements the last word decisionally, as in this case, with respect to the invalidity of a state statute directing itself to the protection of the constitutional right to life of a person. The Court has been faced with a similar problem earlier. In Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 188 (1962) this Court held that a complaint charging that a Tennessee legislative districting statute denied equal protection of the laws to voters alleged a justiciable cause of action. In Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964) this Court held that the legislature of Alabama had been unconstitutionally apportioned. It also held that the lower court > "in ordering into effect a reapportionment of both houses of the Alabama Legislature for purposes of the 1962 primary and general elections, by using the best parts of the two proposed plans which it had found, as a whole, to be invalid, was an appropriate and well considered exercise of judicial power." 377 U.S. at 586-587.

In discussing the problem of federal judicial remedy to be dealt with once a state legislative districting statute had been held unconstitutional, this Court had four concerns: (1) the protection of the right to vote in the absence of a valid statute; and (2) the protection of the right to vote against further elections under the invalid statutory plan; (3) recognition of the state interest in conducting elections so that, under certain circumstances, such as where an impending election is imminent and a state's election machinery is already in progress, equitable considerations might justify a court in withholding the granting of immediately effective relief; (4) establishment of standards for governing action by a federal district court in considering the various factors that should inform its decision-making with respect to that action: viz., "general equitable principles". Id. at 585-586.

In discussing the problem of federal judicial remedy presented in the event that this Court holds the Texas law of abortion to be unconstitutional but affirms that the unborn child is a person and has a right to life protected by the constitutional safeguards of the person, amicus suggests that a central focus of a decision about remedy must be the unborn child whose right to life is placed in danger by the federal invalidation of the Texas law. Just as its mother, father, and their physician have, under the hypothesis being here pursued, a constitutional right that serves to move this Court to invalidate the Texas law, so, too, does the unborn child have a constitutional right to life and the State of Texas a right to act to protect that right to life in a reasonable, constitutional manner. It is in this respect that the problem of remedy is a far more complex and urgent one than that presented to this Court in the legislative redistricting cases.

Under this hypothesis, not only must the Court, as in the legislative redistricting cases, act to protect the interest of the persons whose constitutional right it may hold to have been infringed, but also it must act to protect the interest of the person, viz., the unborn child, whose constitutional right to life would otherwise be infringed by persons in the position of the appellants without possibility of recourse by that child and the State of Texas.

Amicus incorporates by reference the argument made under its Point Two, subpoint B, supra, with respect to the issue of unconstitutional delegation of legislative power and the issue of denial of equal protection of laws and makes that argument applicable to the action of the federal courts in not devising a remedy that will adequately safeguard the right to life of the unborn child. The thrust of the argument in Point Two was that the State of Texas had acted reasonably in enacting its law of abortion because it had thereby avoided an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to private persons and permitting private persons to draw invidious and arbitrary distinctions constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws to unborn children. The thrust of the argument here with respect to these two issues is that the federal courts must design remedies that also avoid these two results. Amicus assumes that the federal courts are subject to limitations in delegating judicial power similar to those under which the Congress operates in delegating legislative power where a constitutional safeguard of the person, and particularly the safeguard of the right to life, is involved. Cf., Eli Lilly & Co. v. Schwegmann Bros. Giant Super Markets, 109 F.Supp. 269 (D.C. La. 1953) affirmed 205 F.2d 788 (C.A. 5, 1953), cert. denied 346 U.S. 856 (1953); United States v. United Mine Workers of America, 330 U.S. 258 (1947).

It is generally recognized that many of the grounds for abortion that have been urged by appellants and by others in their position involve vague judgmatical standards that enter into realms of decision and prediction going well beyond the medical world and its expertise, such as considerations of morals, religion, economic factors, social relationships within the family, number of children, the "socioeconomic state" of the patient, and even legal standards such as the concept of rape and incest. What standards of "rape" and "incest" shall be used? That there are considerable difficulties in the application of these concepts by the courts is well recognized. There are serious fact-finding problems concerning the actual occurrence of intercourse, the participation by the defendant, and the lack of consent by the affected woman. With respect to incest, there are vast differences in the legal standards adopted in the various states concerning the prohibited relationship, the knowledge that is required concerning the prohibited relationship, and the element of consent.[1] It would seem utterly necessary, if the Texas law of abortion is to be invalidated, that the federal courts set up substantive standards to protect the constitutional right to life of unborn children.

Application of such substantive standards required of federal courts, under this hypothesis, must as a matter of procedural due process be done either by the federal courts or by some adequate tribunal. This Court has recently had occasion to speak of the requirements of due process of law with respect to termination, not of a person's life, but of his or her welfare assistance payments under federally assisted programs in the case of Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970).

In the Goldberg case the question for decision was whether a state which terminates public assistance payments to a particular recipient without affording him the opportunity for an evidentiary hearing prior to termination denies the recipient procedural due process in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The New York statute in question did provide the recipient a "fair hearing" following termination of his public assistance. Prior to termination the statute required only an informal investigation without any provisions for personal appearance of the recipient before the appropriate official, for oral presentation of evidence, or for confrontation and cross-examination of adverse witnesses. This Court held that the New York statute denied recipients of public assistance payments procedural due process of law by virtue of failing to provide them with an evidentiary hearing prior to the termination of their payments. In the opinion for the Court, Mr. Justice Brennan stated:

1 See, Granfield, supra at 188-193.

"'By hypothesis, a welfare recipient is destitute, without funds or assets. ...Suffice it to say that to cut off a welfare recipient in the face of ... brutal need' without a prior hearing of some sort is unconscionable, unless overwhelming considerations justify it. Kelly v. Wyman, 294 F.Supp. 893, 899, 900 (1968).

"The constitutional challenge cannot be answered by an argument that public assistance benefits are 'a privilege' and not a 'right'.

"It is true, of course, that some governmental benefits may be administratively terminated without affording the recipient a pre-termination evidentiary hearing. But we agree with the District Court that when welfare is discontinued, only a pre-termination evidentiary hearing provides the recipient with procedural due process. For qualified recipients welfare provides the means to obtain essential food, clothing, housing, and medical care. Thus the crucial factor in this context--a factor not present in the case of the blacklisted governmental contractor, the discharged government employee, the taxpayer denied a tax exemption, or virtually anyone else whose governmental entitlements are ended--is that termination of aid pending resolution of a controversy over eligibility may deprive an eligible recipient of the very means by which to live while he waits. Since he lacks independent resources, his situation becomes immediately desperate. His need to concentrate upon finding the means for daily subsistence, in turn, adversely affects his ability to seek redress from the welfare bureaucracy.

"Moreover, important governmental interests are promoted by affording recipients a pre-termination evidentiary hearing. From its founding the Nation's basic commitment has been to foster the dignity and well-being of all persons within its borders. ...We have come to recognize that forces not within the control of the poor contribute to their poverty. ...Welfare, by meeting the basic demands of subsistence, can help bring within the reach of the poor the same opportunities that are available to others to participate meaningfully in the community. ...The same governmental interests that counsel the provision of welfare, counsel as well its uninterrupted provision to those eligible to receive it; pre-termination evidentiary hearings are indispensable to that end." 397 U.S. at 261-3.

In the instant case more than the right to public assistance in the form of medical care for unborn children or assistance for their mothers is involved. It seems clear that the federal courts must, in the absence of a valid state law on abortion, provide or designate a tribunal to consider individual cases of desired abortion and provide for the appointment of a guardian ad litem to protect the life of the unborn child against unwarranted invasion due to the failure to satisfy constitutional criteria for valid abortions. If public assistance, whether of money or medical care, for the mother, including the mother of an unborn child, cannot be terminated without a prior hearing and the opportunity to know the grounds being relied upon for termination and for cross-examination of the social worker involved, it must be even more true that the life of a human person, including that of the unborn child, cannot be terminated validly, at least under standards going beyond the "medical" standards of the State of Texas and District of Columbia statutes, without a hearing of the child through a guardian ad litem before some competent tribunal. All that can be said of the recipient of welfare and his or her dependence upon it is even more true of the unborn child in its mother's womb. The child in the womb also needs "essential food, ...housing, and medical care." Termination of the life of the unborn child also deprives that child "of the very means by which to live." Also, "(h)is situation becomes immediately desperate." Indeed, the situation for the unborn child becomes much more desperate than for the welfare recipient once the decision to terminate has been made. There is no hope of escape for the unborn child while at least the welfare recipient can hope to escape by some effort of his own or by some unforeseen course of events. Moreover, by requiring a pre-termination hearing "important governmental interests are promoted". "From its founding the Nation's basic commitment has been to foster the dignity and well-being of all persons within its borders..." including unborn children. By meeting the unborn child's basic demands for life, government generally and the federal courts, in particular, "can help bring within the reach of..." unborn children "the same opportunities that are available to others to participate meaningfully in the life of the community." Ibid.

The application of the Goldberg case rationale to the situation now envisaged is an a fortiori matter, therefore. Indeed, it may well be that the pre-termination hearing required under that rationale will not suffice with respect to the official decision to permit termination of human life by abortion. Under the New York statute the right was accorded to the welfare recipient to a fair hearing after the termination of public assistance to him. But that kind of hearing is not an available or feasible one in the instant situation. The unborn child's life is taken by the termination and not merely his right to welfare assistance. Moreover, it is life and not just public assistance that is at stake. Amicus contends that the abbreviated evidentiary hearing required by Goldberg before termination of public assistance is an insufficient protection of the constitutional right to life of unborn children before termination of that right by action or permission of a competent tribunal. The pre-termination stage is, for the unborn child, the final stage. For this reason, amicus contends that all of the due process requisites, including notice, representation by counsel, evidentiary hearing, trial, and record, must be provided the unborn child at the pre-termination proceeding before abortion is performed.

The reliance placed so far, in this question of procedural due process, upon the Goldberg case must not divert attention from the fact that the whole realm of procedural due process cases, whether involving the criminal or civil procedure in adjudication by courts, the procedure employed by administrative agencies, or the procedure utilized by other official agencies of government, support the position of amicus. It would be a mockery of the very concept of procedural due process to insist upon important procedural safeguards in criminal adjudication and in administrative decision-making in matters involving life, liberty, and property while permitting federal courts, in the situation here hypothesized, to decide upon permitting the termination or destruction of the life of a human being, an unborn child, without requiring the substance of the same important procedural safeguards absent some emergency involving the necessity of acting to save the life of the mother or avoiding a grave peril to her health. Perhaps the matter has been no better stated than by Professor Kenneth Pye:

> "The notion of a national concept of basic justice does not seem too radical for America a century after the Civil War. It is not surprising that the majority of the Court has accepted the argument that the genius of federalism does not require that states be permitted to experiment with the fundamental rights of defendants in criminal cases any more than it permits experimentation with first amendment freedoms. The mere status of being in America should confer protection broad enough to protect any man from the vagaries of a state which by inertia or design fails to keep pace with a national consensus concerning the fundamental rights of the individual in our society."[1]

But if the states cannot be permitted to experiment with the fundamental rights of the individual human person in our society, neither can the federal government be permitted to experiment with those rights, and especially with the right to life of defenseless, innocent unborn children.

As appellants would have it, the federal courts should simply declare the Texas law of abortion unconstitutional and enjoin its further enforcement. The disregard for the sanctity of human life involved in this position is total with respect to unborn children. There is no focus upon the interests of these children. There is left no express standard for judgment which requires either the parents, the federal courts, or any other agency of government, or physicians to consider the interests and welfare of unborn children. On the other hand, the only focus of this position is upon the interests of the mother and the father. The denial of substantive due process to which the present argument is directed is not the invidious discrimination between two human persons, the mother and her unborn child or the unborn child subjected to abortion and the one not so subjected. It is rather the denial of substantive due process involved in the total failure of the appellants and the lower court to take the human person into account whose life is to be destroyed as a result. This type of position and decision-making cannot be permitted. It contains no rational connection between the means selected and the goal pursued. Protection of the health, both physical and mental, of the mother is a legitimate goal of government. It is not a legitimate means of government to destroy the innocent human life of an unborn child in a situation in which that life bears no threat to the life of its mother or a grave peril for her health. Rather the protection of such life is a goal or end of government in free political societies. Before the life of an innocent unborn child can be destroyed as a result of a federal court decision, there must be a sufficient reason for destroying it, if this is to be allowed at all. The reason must be grounded in the nature or situation of the child and the threat it carries, if it so does, to its mother. The threat must be real and not feigned. The threat must be one that cannot be otherwise dealt with by physicians than by the taking of the life of the unborn child. If the situation is anything short of this, there can be no rational justification for the taking of the life of an innocent unborn child. From the standpoint of substantive due process, the essential vice of the position of appellants and the decision of the lower court, is that it requires no focus upon the interests of the unborn child and whether the child is a threat to the life of or a grave peril to the health of its mother. Because that position and decision is devoid of any regard for the interests of the unborn child, the destruction of whose life they support, they are wholly arbitrary and unreasonable. They fail to insist upon a reason for destroying the life of the unborn child that is sufficient relative to the great interest that is being destroyed and that is grounded upon what is necessary to be done in order to deal with harm to the mother that is being caused by or that is traceable to that child.

The cases that most closely support the above analysis are those that view the infliction of great deprivation upon innocent persons as punishment that cannot be constitutionally justified. If it is not constitutionally permissible to make it a misdeameanor, subject to a mandatory jail term of not less than 90 days, for a person to be addicted to the use of narcotics, surely it is not constitutionally permissible to destroy an innocent unborn child, a human person also, for a reason that is not grounded in the threat to the life or the grave peril to the health of its mother which it presents, but rather for a reason grounded wholly in the interests of the mother unrelated to the interests of the child. See, e.g., Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962). Moreover, if it is not constitutionally permissible to impose expatriation upon a native-born citizen because of war-time desertion from the armed services or for voting in a foreign election, surely it is not constitutionally permissible to expatriate an unborn child from all human society by abortion for a reason that is not grounded in any threat to the life of or grave peril to the health of its mother. See, e.g., Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958). These cases were decided in part under the Eighth Amendment as involving cruel and unusual punishment.

The decisions holding that Congress has no power to strip citizens of their citizenship without their consent because of the Fourteenth Amendment regulation of what persons are citizens of the United States are obviously also relevant. See, e.g., Afroyim v. Rusk, 387 U.S. 253.(1967). It is not inappropriate to point out that in the latter case the Court was talking about a person who was born in the United States. The Court specifically observed that Congress had no authority under the Fourteenth Amendment to restrict the effect of birth, declared by the Constitution to constitute a sufficient and complete right to citizenship. But if Congress has no such power, how can it constitutionally undercut the effect of birth by decreeing before that event the destruction of the innocent unborn child who, upon birth, would have become a citizen by virtue of the same Constitution. If this Court or Congress could permit or direct this destruction without regard for the interests of the unborn child, they could destroy its right of citizenship, which is not constitutionally permissible. For this reason, it cannot be constitutionally permissible to prevent the unborn child from becoming a citizen by birth except for reasons that can pass muster under the concept of substantive due process.

The substantive due process cases bearing the closest analogy to the instant case are those concerned with the protection of the right to free speech. The right to life is one of the most important, if not the most important of, constitutional rights. The right to free speech is also a very important constitutional right of the person. Under the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause "life"is specifically protect d while free speech is protected under the aegis of "liberty". Of course, the First Amendment protects free speech specifically against federal action and the Fifth Amendment protects life specifically against such action. The point here is that without protection of the life of a person there cannot be any recognition or protection of his right to liberty and to property.

We should say, at least, that the important constitutional right to life should not be less protected than the constitutional right to free speech. Probably, it should receive even greater protection. Yet an examination of the free speech cases indicates that the right to free speech is a highly protected constitutional right. In the earlier cases, the doctrine emerged that "the holding of meetings for peaceable political action cannot be proscribed". De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 365 (1937). The right of free speech in this context was an absolute right against government. Even in the context of speech advocating the overthrow of government by unlawful force, Justices Brandeis and Holmes articulated the test of the protection of such speech that was to be given effect in a broad spectrum of cases involving speech:

> "The fact that speech is likely to result in some violence or in destruction of property is not enough to justify its suppression. There must be the probability of serious injury to the State. ...the issue (is) whether there actually did exist at the time a clear danger; whether the danger, if any, was imminent; and whether the evil apprehended was so substantial as to justify the stringent restriction interposed by the legislature." Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357, 378-379 (1927).

In more recent decades, the degree of the constitutional protection of speech has brought even more stringent standards for its protection by the courts in many contexts. Mr. Justice Black insisted that there is an absolute prohibition against the government awarding damages to a public official in his suit against critics of his official conduct. New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 293 (1964). With respect to advocacy of possibly violent political action at a meeting of the Ku Klux Klan, Mr. Justice Douglas took the position that the "clear and present danger" test does not sufficiently protect speech and "is not reconciliable with the First Amendment in days of peace. ...I see no place in the regime of the First Amendment for any 'clear and present danger test', whether strict and tight as some would make it, or free-wheeling as the Court in Dennis rephrased it." Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 452, 454 (1969) (dissenting opinion, Mr. Justice Black, concurring).

If there ever was a constitutional right that was entitled to be treated as an "absolute" one, it is the right to life of an innocent person, and especially that of an unborn child. There is good precedent for so holding drawn from the cases protecting the lesser, although highly important, constitutional rights of free speech, freedom of religion, and freedom from law respecting establishment of religion. But at the very least, that protection should not be less than the highest protection accorded under the decided cases to these important rights. In light of these cases no decision can possibly pass constitutional muster under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, considered in its substantive aspects, if that decision authorizes the performance of abortions without a consideration of the crucially important interests and rights of the unborn child, without a direction for a response to those interests, and without a requirement that the most compelling and vital interests of government be involved and that the abortion be necessary to accomplish those interests where no reasonable alternative is available.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated in this brief and in the brief of the appellee, amicus respectfully urges that this Court reverse the judgment of the three-judge court below insofar as it held unconstitutional the Texas law of abortion and affirm the judgment of that court insofar as it denied injunctive relief. But if this Court affirms the judgment of the three-judge court below insofar as it held unconstitutional the Texas law of abortion, amicus respectfully urges, in the alternative, that this Court provide substantive standards for guiding decision concerning performance of abortions so as to protect the constitutional right to life of the unborn child and provide or direct the resort to a competent tribunal for a hearing in accordance with procedural due process before an abortion going beyond the Texas law of abortion is permitted to be performed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

NO. 70-18, 1971 TERM

JANE ROE, JOHN DOE, MARY DOE, AND JAMES HUBERT HALLFORD, M.D.

Appellants,

vs.

HENRY WADE,
DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF DALLAS COUNTY, TEXAS

Appellee.

ON DIRECT APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

BRIEF FOR APPELLEE

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Appellant Jane Roe instituted an action, suing on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated, contending she was an unmarried pregnant female who desired to terminate her pregnancy by "abortion" and that she was unable to secure a legal abortion in the State of Texas because of the prohibitions of the Texas Penal Code, Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194, and 1196.[1] She further contends she cannot afford to travel to another jurisdiction to secure a legal abortion.[2]

Appellants John and Mary Doe instituted their action, suing on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, contending they were a childless married couple and that Appellant Mary Doe's physician had advised her to avoid pregnancy because of a neural-chemical disorder.[3] They further contend their physician has further advised against the use of birth control pills and, though they are now practicing an alternative method of contraception, they understand there is nevertheless a significant risk of contraceptive failure.[4] They contend that should Appellant Mary Doe become pregnant, she would want to terminate such pregnancy by abortion and would be unable to do so in the State of Texas because of the above prohibitory statutes.[5]

Appellant James Hubert Hallford, M.D., filed his Application for Leave to Intervene in Appellant Roe's action[6] and his Application was granted.[7] He contends he is in the active practice of medicine and contends the Texas Abortion Laws are a principal deterrent to physicians and patients in their relationship in connection with therapeutic hospital and clinical abortions.[8] Appellant Hallford was under indictment in two (2) cases in Dallas County, Texas, charged with the offense of abortion in violation of the Statutes in issue.[9]

In substance, Appellants contended in their Complaints filed in the lower court that (1) the Texas Abortion Laws are unconstitutionally vague and uncertain on their face,

Appellants sought declaratory relief that the Texas Abortion Laws were unconstitutional in violation of the Constitution of the United States and injunctive relief against the future enforcement of such Statutes.[11] They prayed that a three-judge court be convened to hear and determine their causes of action.[12]

Appellee Henry Wade filed his Answer to Appellant Roe's Complaint[13], his Motion to Dismiss the Complaint of Appellants John and Mary Doe[14] and his Answer to Appellant Hallford's Complaint.[15] The State of Texas was granted leave to respond to the Appellants' Complaints and filed its Motion to Dismiss all Complaints and its alternative plea for Judgment on the Pleadings.[16] Both Motions to Dismiss challenged the standing of Appellants John and Mary Doe[17] and the State of Texas' Motion to Dismiss challenged the standing of Appellants Roe and Hallford.[18] In addition, the State of Texas' Motion to Dismiss asserted that Appellants (1) failed to state a claim upon which relief may be granted, (2) failed to raise a substantial Constitutional question, (3) failed to show irreparable injury and the absence of an adequate remedy at law, and (4) Appellant Hallford's Complaint was barred by 28 U.S.C. 2283.[19]

In the course of proceeding in the lower court, Appellants filed their Motions for Summary Judgment.[20] In support of Appellant Jane Doe's Motion for Summary Judgment, she filed her affidavit[21] and an affidavit of one Paul Carey Trickett, M.D.[22] Appellant Hallford filed his affidavit in support of his Motion for Summary Judgment[23] and annexed copies of the indictments pending against him.[24]

The cases were consolidated and processed to a hearing before the Honorable Irving L. Goldberg, Circuit Judge, and the Honorable Sarah T. Hughes and W. M. Taylor, Jr., District Judges.[25] Neither the Appellants nor the Appellee offered any evidence at such hearing[26] and arguments were presented by all parties. The Court tendered its Judgment[27] and Opinion[28] on June 17, 1970.

Appellants filed Notice of Appeal to this Court pursuant to the provisions of 28 U.S.C. 1253.[29] Appellants Roe and Hallford and Appellee Wade filed Notice of Appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.[30]

Appellants filed their Motion to Hold Appeal to Fifth Circuit of Appellee Wade in Abeyance Pending Decision by the Supreme Court of the United States[31], which Motion was granted.[32]

The lower court found that Appellants Roe and Hallford and the members of their respective classes[33] had standing to bring their lawsuits, but that Appellants John and Mary Doe had failed to allege facts sufficient to create a present controversy and did not have standing.[34] That court held the Texas Abortion Laws unconstitutional in that they deprived single women and married persons of the right to choose whether to have children in violation of the Ninth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and that such Laws were void on their face for unconstitutional overbreath and vagueness.[35] The court denied Appellants' applications for injunctive relief.[36]

STATUTES IN ISSUE

The Texas Abortion Laws and the statutes in issue are contained in the Texas Penal Code and consist of the following:

Article 1191. ABORTION

> If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use toward her any violence or means whatsoever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary for not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth shall be caused.

Art. 1192. FURNISHING THE MEANS

Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is guilty as an accomplice.

Art. 1193. ATTEMPT AT ABORTION

If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided it be shown that such means was calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars.

Art. 1194. MURDER IN PRODUCING ABORTION

If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder.

Art. 1196. BY MEDICAL ADVICE

Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother.[37]

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

In Appellee's opinion the questions presented may be precisely stated as follows:

I. WHETHER APPELLANTS JANE ROE, AND JOHN AND MARY DOE, PRESENT A JUSTICIABLE CONTROVERSY IN THEIR CHALLENGE TO THE TEXAS ABORTION LAWS?

II. WHETHER THE COURT SHOULD ENJOIN THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE TEXAS ABORTION LAWS AS TO APPELLANT HALLFORD IN THE LIGHT OF PENDING STATE CRIMINAL CHARGES?

[37]The omitted article, Article 1195, concerns destruction of the vitality or life of a child in a state of being born and before actual birth, which such child would otherwise have been born alive.

III. DID THE DISTRICT COURT ERR IN REFUSING TO ENJOIN FUTURE ENFORCEMENT OF THE TEXAS ABORTION LAWS AFTER DECLARING SUCH LAWS UNCONSTITUTIONAL?

IV. WHETHER THIS COURT CAN CONSIDER PLENARY REVIEW OF AN ENTIRE CASE WHEN A LOWER COURT GRANTS DECLARATORY RELIEF HOLDING A STATE STATUTE UNCONSTITUTIONAL, BUT REFUSES TO ENJOIN FUTURE ENFORCEMENT OF SUCH STATUTE, AND THE APPEAL TO THIS COURT IS FROM THAT PORTION OF THE JUDGMENT DENYING INJUNCTIVE RELIEF?

V. WHETHER ARTICLES 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 AND 1196 OF THE TEXAS PENAL CODE ARE VOID ON THEIR FACE BECAUSE OF UNCONSTITUTIONAL OVERBREATH AND VAGUENESS?

VI. WHETHER THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES GUARANTEES A WOMAN THE RIGHT TO ABORT AN UNBORN FETUS?

VII. WHETHER THE STATE OF TEXAS HAS A LEGITIMATE INTEREST IN PREVENTING ABORTION EXCEPT UNDER THE LIMITED EXCEPTION OF "AN ABORTION PROCURED OR ATTEMPTED BY MEDICAL ADVICE FOR THE PURPOSE OF SAVING THE LIFE OF THE MOTHER"?

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

Appellant Jane Roe has not presented a justiciable controversy admitting of specific relief for this Court in her challenge to the Texas Abortion Laws. She has not shown that she has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as a result of enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws. Any cause of action that she may have had is not established by the record and has been mooted by the termination of her pregnancy.

Appellants John and Mary Doe's cause of action is based on speculation and conjecture and they also have not shown they have sustained or are immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as a result of enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws essential to standing and a justiciable controversy.

Appellant Hallford is under indictment in two cases for violation of the statutes he attacks in the controversy before the Court. The Court should abstain from exercising jurisdiction under the principles enunciated in Younger v. Harris, etc. Appellant Hallford is not entitled to assert a cause of action on behalf of his patients in the physician-patient relationship.

For a federal court to grant injunctive relief against the enforcement of a state statute, there must be a clear and persuasive showing of unconstitutionality and irreparable harm. The lower court can divorce injunctive and declaratory relief under its equity power and declare a statute unconstitutional, yet refuse to enjoin the enforcement of such statute.

Once a federal court has assumed jurisdiction of a cause, it may properly assume jurisdiction of the entire controversy and render a decision on all questions presented and involved in the case. If this Court determines that it has jurisdiction to consider the denial of injunctive relief to Appellants by the lower court, it may consider the constitutionality of the Texas Abortion Laws determined to be unconstitutional by the Court below.

The Texas Abortion Laws are not violative of the Constitution of the United States as being unconstitutionally vague and overboard. United States v. Vuitch is decisive of the issues in this case as to vagueness and overbreath.

Though the right of "marital privacy" and "personal privacy" are recognized, they have never been regarded as absolute. The "right to privacy" is a relative right that, in the matter of abortion, is not attached to an express right guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States. The right to life of the unborn child is superior to the right of privacy of the mother.

The state has a legitimate, if not compelling, interest in prohibiting abortion except under limited circumstances. In the light of recent findings and research in medicine, the fetus is a human being and the state has an interest in the arbitrary and unjustified destruction of this being.

ARGUMENT

I. APPELLANTS JANE ROE, JOHN AND MARY DOE, HAVE NOT PRESENTED A JUSTICIABLE CONTROVERSY IN THEIR CHALLENGE TO THE TEXAS ABORTION LAWS.

A. JUSTICIABILITY AND STANDING.

Article III of the Constitution of the United States limits the judicial power of Federal Courts to "cases" and "controversies". This has been construed by the courts to prohibit the giving of advisory opinions. Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1968); Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226 (1964); United States v. Fruehauf 365 U.S. 146, (1961). There must be a real and substantial controversy admitting of specific relief as distinguished from an opinion advising what the law would be upon a hypothetical state of facts. Aetna Life Insurance Company v. Hayworth, 300 U.S. 227 (1937); accord, Public Service Commission of Utah v. Wycoff Company, 344 U.S. 237 (1952); Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962); Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U.S. 103 (1969). Correlatively, a party challenging a statute as invalid must show that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as a result of the statute's enforcement before a three-judge court or any

Federal court can entertain the action. Frothingham v. Mellon[38], 262 U.S. 447 (1923); Ex parte Levitt, 302 U.S. 633 (1937); Fairchild v. Hughes 258 U.S. 126 (1922); Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961). In a per curiam opinion this Court stated in Ex Parte Levitt:

> "It is an established principle that to entitle a private individual to invoke the judicial power to determine the validity of executive or legislative action he must show that he has sustained, or is immediately in danger of sustaining, a direct injury as the result of that action and it is not sufficient that he has merely a general interest common to all members of the public." (Emphasis added). 302 U.S. at 634.

In Flask v. Cohen, supra, this Court gave careful consideration to the nexus between standing and justiciability and stated that "Standing is an aspect of justiciability and, as such, the problem of standing is surrounded by the same complexities and vagaries that inhere in justiciability". 392 U.S. at 98-99. Most probably, the best known decision of this Court on standing is Frothingham v. Mellon, supra, in which Mrs. Frothingham claimed that she was a taxpayer of the United States and sued to restrain payments from the Treasury to the several states which chose to participate in a program created by the Maternity Act of 1921. She claimed that the Federal government lacked power to appropriate money for the reduction of maternal and infant mortality, and that such appropriations would cause an unconstitutional increase in her future taxes. After considerations of the interest of an individual taxpayer, remoteness, and other issues, this Court finally stated that its power to declare statutes unconstitutional exists only where the statute is involved in a justiciable case, and that to present such a case the plaintiff "must be able to show, not only that the statute is invalid, but that he has sustained or is immediately in danger of sustaining some direct injury as the result of its enforcement, and not merely that he suffers in some indefinite way in common with the people generally". 262 U.S. at 488. See, Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction, 368 U.S. 278 (1961); Baker v. Carr, supra; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People v. Button, 371 U.S. 415 (1963).

A review and analysis of the decisions on standing indicate they are not easy to reconcile on the facts. It is frequently stated that to have standing a party must be able to demonstrate injury to a legally protected right or interest. Tennessee Electric Power Co. v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 306 U.S. 118 (1937); Alabama Power Company v. Ickes, 302 U.S. 464 (1938); Perkins v. Lukens Steel Co., 310 U.S. 113 (1940).

B. STANDING OF APPELLANTS JOHN AND MARY DOE.

Applying the standards of justiciability and standing stated above, an examination of the cause of action asserted by Appellants John and Mary Doe discloses they do not have standing. In their Complaint they contend they are a childless married couple and Mary Doe was not pregnant at that time.[39] Their cause of action is based upon their fear of contraceptive failure resulting in pregnancy to Mary Doe at a time when they are not properly prepared to accept the responsibilities of parenthood and upon the advice of their physician to avoid pregnancy until her health condition improves.[40] The record is wholly lacking in proof of these contentions. The lower court properly and correctly denied standing to these Appellants upon finding they failed to allege facts sufficient to create a present controversy.[41]

[39]A. 16.
[40]A. 17.
[41]A. 124.

Initially, it may be stated that neither Appellants Doe nor Roe can be prosecuted under the Texas Abortion Laws for securing an abortion or for attempted abortion. Gray v. State, 178 S.W. 337 (Tex.Crim. 1915); Shaw v. State, 165 S.W. 930 (Tex.Crim. 1914). Appellants John and Mary Doe's cause of action is based upon speculation of future contraceptive failure resulting in pregnancy of Mary Doe and the future speculation that these Appellants will not at that time be prepared for parenthood and, further, that Appellant Mary Doe's health condition at that time will be impaired by pregnancy. These speculative fears cannot support a cause of action. See, Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971); Golden v. Zwickler, supra. For a court to decide the merits of Appellants John and Mary Doe's cause of action would result in giving an advisory opinion upon a hypothetical state of facts contrary to Federal Constitutional limitations and this Court's holdings in Flask v. Cohen, supra, and cases cited, supra, at p. 9.

C. STANDING OF APPELLANT JANE ROE.

Appellant Jane Roe occupies a more unique position in regard to standing. She filed her Amended Complaint in the District Court on April 22, 1970,[42] and an "alias affidavit" on May 21, 1970.[43] The only support in the record for her contentions and allegations giving rise to her cause of action is found in her Amended Complaint and her "alias affidavit". The affidavit filed after the commencement of her action indicates she did not desire an aboration at the time of its filing.[44] This affidavit further shows that Appellant Roe had been pregnant for several months prior to its filing.[45] The hearing was held before the three-judge panel on July 22, 1970,[46] some four and one-half (4½) months after the filing of her Original Complaint[47] and on November 3, 1971, some twenty (20) months will have expired since the filing of said Original Complaint. There is no indication in the record that Appellant Jane Roe was pregnant at the time of the hearing on July 22, 1970, and it can be reasonably concluded that she is not now pregnant.[48]

The argument that Appellant Jane Roe has not presented a justiciable controversy to give her standing is not intended to be fictitious or spurious. If her statements in her affidavit did not moot her cause of action, resort may be had to Golden v. Zwickler, supra, wherein this Court stated:

> "The District Court erred in holding that Zwickler was entitled to declaratory relief if the elements essential to that relief existed '[w]hen this action was initiated.' The proper inquiry was whether a 'controversy' requisite to relief under the Declaratory Judgment Act existed at the time of the hearing on remand." 394 U.S. at 108.[49]

Golden v. Zwickler indicates that this Court should consider an issue as to standing at the time it reviews the case and not when the suit was filed. This is supported to some extent by Bryan v. Austin. 354 U.S. 933 (1957), wherein Plaintiffs sought to have a South Caroline statute declared unconstitutional and, pending appeal, the statute in question was repealed. In a per curiam opinion this Court stated that the repeal of the statute in issue after the decision of the District Court rendered the cause moot. Atherton Mills v. Johnston, 259 U.S. 13 (1922), involved a suit for injunctive relief to prevent the discharge of a minor employee because of the Child Labor Act of 1919, which was challenged as being invalid. While the case was on appeal, the minor employee involved became of age. This Court held that the case became moot by the lapse of time and the case could not be considered by the Court.

Mootness deprives a federal court of its judicial power since no case or controversy exists. Mechling Barge Lines, Inc., v. United States, 368 U.S. 3224 (1961); Local No.8-6 v. Missouri, 361 U.S. 363 (1960); Flast v. Cohen, supra; Parker v. Ellis, 362 U.S. 574 (1960).

D. CLASS ACTION ASPECTS.

It is questionable whether the requirements of Rule 23, Fed. Rules Civ. Proc., have been complied with in connection with Appellants Roe and John and Mary Doe's attempt to bring their suits as class actions. These Appellants have alleged the prerequisites required in Rule 23 (a),[50] but have not designated whether their actions are (b) (1) or (b) (2) actions under Rule 23. Again, the record is wholly void of any showing of the propriety of class action relief and the only other mention of this aspect of the case is found in the lower court's judgment as follows:

> "(1) Plaintiff Jane Roe, plaintiff-intervenor James Hubert Hallford, M.D. and the members of their respective classes have standing to bring this lawsuit." (A. 124).[51]

[50]A. 12, 19.

[51]Appellant Hallford's Complaint makes no mention of class action relief. (A. 24-35).

POOR COPY
BLEED THROUGH

The 1966 amendments to Rule 23 require the judgment in a (b) (1) or (b) (2) class action to include and describe those whom the court finds to be members of the class. In a Rule 23 (b) (3) class action the 1966 amendments require the judgment include and specify or describe those to whom notice was directed, as required by Rule 23 (c) (2), and who have not requested exclusion, and who are found by the court to be members of the class.

In Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45 (1969), this Court had before it on direct appeal a case involving new residents of the State of Colorado, who had moved into the State four (4) or five (5) months prior to the November, 1968, presidential election. They were refused permission to vote because of a Colorado statute imposing a six (6) months residency requirement. They commenced a suit as a class action challenging the constitutionality of the statute. A three-judge court upheld the constitutionality of the statute. Thereafter, the election was held, and the State statute was amended to reduce the residency requirement for a presidential election to two (2) months. This Court, in a per curiam opinion, held that, aside from the fact that the election had been held, the case was rendered moot by the amendment to the statute that reduced the residency requirement to two (2) months, and under which the Appellants could vote, since the case had lost its character as a present, live controversy, notwithstanding that the Appellants had denominated their suit as a class action and had expressed opposition to residency requirements in general. In Golden v. Zwickler, supra, a distributor of anonymous handbills criticizing a congressman's voting record sought a declaratory judgment concerning the constitutionality of a New York statute which penalized the distributor of anonymous literature in connection with an election campaign. While the case was pending, the congressman left the House of Representatives and accepted a term as a justice on the Supreme Court of New York. The United States District Court held that the distributor was nevertheless entitled to a declaratory judgment because a genuine controversy had existed at the commencement of the action. This Court held there was no "controversy" of "sufficient immediacy and reality" to warrant a declaratory judgment and, in addition, stated as follows:

> "It is not enough to say, as did the District Court, that nevertheless Zwickler has a 'further and far broader right to a general adjudication of unconstitutionality . . . [in] [h]is own interest as well as that of others who would with like anonymity practise free speech in a political environment . . . .' The constitutional question, First Amendment or otherwise, must be presented in the context of a specific live grievance." (Emphasis added). 394 U.S. at 118.

See, Burrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953).

The Federal Constitution limitations in Article III cannot be extended or limited by asserting a "class action" under Rule 23. Rule 82, Fed. Rules Civ. Proc., in referring to the preceding rules, including Rule 23, provides in part that "These rules shall not be construed to extend or limit the jurisdiction of the United States district courts or the venue of actions therein. . . ."

II. THIS COURT SHOULD REFUSE DECLARATORY AND INJUNCTIVE RELIEF TO APPELLANT JAMES HUBERT HALLFORD, M.D.

In Indictment No. 2023 A, Appellant James Hubert Hallford stands charged by the State of Texas with performing an abortion on Frances C. King,[52] and in Indictment No. 556 J with performing an abortion on Jane Wilhelm.[53] He sought and obtained leave to intervene in Appellant Roe's action[54] seeking a permanent injunction against the enforcement of the Texas Abortion Laws,[55] but reserving a right to make an application for an interlocutory injunction.[56] In reality, Appellant Hallford is seeking to avoid criminal prosecution in the criminal cases pending against him.

Historically there has been great reluctance by the federal courts to interfere in the operations of a state court. Stefanelli v. Minard, 342 U.S. 117 (1951). General principles should be enough to show that an independent federal action is not an appropriate means to raise what should be a state court defense, but this does not stand alone. A statute almost as old as the Republic, the Anti-Injunction Act of 1793, has, with some variations in language over the years, provided that a court of the United States "may not grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a State court . . ." 28 U.S.C. 2283. This statute is no happenstance. It is a "limitation of the power of federal courts dating almost from the beginning of our history and expressing an important Congressional policy—to prevent friction between state and federal courts." Oklahoma Packing Co. v. Oklahoma & Elec. Co., 309 U.S. 4 (1940).

Appellant Hallford's Complaint allegations do not justify the conclusion that any criminal charges have been brought against him in bad faith or under any conditions that would place his case within Dombrowski's "special circumstances". Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965.) There is no relationship worthy of note in the allegations contained in Paragraph 14 of this Complaint[57] to Dom- browski's "special circumstances". He appears to indicate that the State of Texas must negate the exception provided in Article 1196, supra,[18] and that he cannot offer medical testimony to bring him within the purview of the exception.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Engineers, 398 U.S. 281 (1970), the railroad obtained a state injunction against a union's picketing and the union sought and obtained in the Federal District Court an injunction against the enforcement of the state court injunction. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed the Federal District Court's judgment and, on certiorari, this Court reversed and remanded stating as follows:

> "First, a federal court does not have inherent power to ignore the limitations of Section 2283 and to enjoin state court proceedings merely because those proceedings interfere with a protected federal right or invade an area preempted by federal law, even when the interference is unmistakably clear. This rule applies regardless of whether the federal court itself has jurisdiction over the controversy, or whether it is ousted from jurisdiction for the same reason that the state court is." (Omitting authority). 398 U.S. at 294-295.

The above principle of federal abstention is further enunciated in Spielman Motor Sales Co., Inc., v. Dodge, 295 U.S. 89 (1935); Cameron v. Johnson, 390 U.S. 611 (1968); Shaw v. Garrison, 293 F.Supp. 937 (E.D.La. 1968), aff'd per curiam, 393 U.S. 220 (1968); City of Greenwood v. Peacock, 384 U.S. 808 (1966).

More recently, this Court has announced certain guidelines on the subject of federal court interference with pending state criminal proceedings in what is sometimes referred to as the "February 23rd Decisions". Younger v. Harris, supra, Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66 (1971); Boyle v. Landry, 401 U.S. 77 (1971); Dyson v. Stein, 401 U.S. 200 (1971); Perez v. Ledesma, 401 U.S. 82 (1971); Byrne v. Karalexis, 401 U.S. 216 (1971). These cases very strongly indicate the availability of federal injunctive relief against pending state criminal prosecutions has been severely curtailed even in the area of First Amendment rights of expression. Thus, federal interference, even to the extent of granting preliminary restraining orders and convening three-judge courts is by far the exception rather than the rule.

The above cases further indicate that, independent of any obstacles posed by the federal anti-injunction statute, the primary prerequisite to federal court intervention in the present context, is a showing of irreparable injury. Even irreparable injury is insufficient unless it is "both great and immediate". In Younger v. Harris, supra, this Court stated as follows:

> "Certain types of injury, in particular, the cost, anxiety, and inconvenience of having to defend against a single criminal prosecution, could not by themselves be considered 'irreparable' in the special legal sense of that term. Instead, the threat to the Plaintiff's federally protected rights must be one that cannot be eliminated by his defense against a single criminal prosecution." 401 U.S. at 46.

Accord, Byrne v. Karalexis, supra.

Samuels v. Mackell, supra, considered declaratory relief prayed for in relation to the federal court's reluctance to interfere with pending state criminal proceedings and this Court stated:

> "We therefore hold that, in cases where the state criminal prosecution was begun prior to the federal suit, same equitable principles relevant to the propriety of an injunction must be taken into consideration by federal district courts in determining whether to issue a declaratory judgment, and that where an injunction would be impermissible under these principles, declaratory relief should be denied as well . . . . Ordinarily, however, the practical effect of the two forms of relief will be virtually identical, and the basic policy against federal interference with pending state criminal prosecutions will be frustrated as much by a declaratory judgment as it would be by an injunction." (Emphasis added). 401 U.S. at 73.

Nor can Appellant rely upon his patients' rights, which a statute supposedly threatens. See Tileston v. Ullman, 318 U.S. 44 (1943); accord, Golden v. Zwicker, supra; Burrows v. Jackson, supra.

Applying the guidelines set forth in Younger v. Harris, supra, and the other "February 23rd Decisions", this Court can properly conclude Appellant Hallford has not suffered, nor under the present state of the record, will suffer both great and immediate irreparable injury of the nature required to authorize federal injunctive or declaratory relief. His case is precisely the type to which this Court was addressing itself in the recent pronouncements condemning, except in very limited circumstances, federal court equitable injunctive and declaratory interference with pending state criminal prosecutions.

III. THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT DID NOT ERR IN REFUSING TO ENJOIN FUTURE ENFORCEMENT OF THE TEXAS ABORTON LAWS AFTER DECLARING SUCH LAWS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

This Court has been unwaivering in holding that a three-judge court cannot consider an action for injunctive relief under 28 U.S.C. 2281 on its merits without a preliminary showing of irreparable harm and no adequate legal remedy. In Spielman Motor Sales Co. Inc., v. Dodge, supra, a suit requesting a three-judge court to enjoin a New York district attorney from instituting criminal prosecutions against certain defendants under an alleged unconstitutional state statute, this court affirmed the lower court's dismissal of the action and stated:

> "The general rule is that equity will not interfere to prevent the enforcement of a criminal statute even though unconstitutional. . . . To justify such interference there must be exceptional circumstances and a clear showing that an injunction is necessary in order to afford adequate protection of constitutional rights." 295 U.S. at 95.

In Mayo v. Lakeland Highlands Canning Co., Inc., 309 U.S. 310 (1940), a suit was brought before a three-judge court seeking to enjoin the Florida Agriculture Commission from enforcing an alleged unconstitutional state statute. This Court reversed the lower court's disposition on the merits and made the following observation:

> "The legislation requiring the convening of a court of three judges in cases such as this was intended to insure that the enforcement of a challenged statute should not be suspended by injunction except upon a clear and persuasive showing of unconstitutionality and irreparable injury." 309 U.S. at 318-319.

Accord, Beal v. Missouri Pacific Railroad Corporation, 312 U.S. 45 (1961); Douglas v. City of Jeannette, 319 U.S. 157 (1943); Bryne v. Karalexis, supra; Dyson v. Stein, supra; Samuels v. Mackell, supra; Younger v. Harris, supra.

The lower court cited Dombrowski v. Pfister, supra, and Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U.S. 241 (1967), as authority for the court to divorce injunctive and declaratory relief.[59] In Powell v. McCormack, 395 U.S. 486 (1969), this Court held that a court may grant declaratory relief even though it chooses not to issue an injunction or mandamus. 395 U.S. at 504. See, United Public Workers v. Mitchell, 330 U.S. 75 (1947).

IV. THIS COURT CAN CONSIDER PLENARY REVIEW OF THE ENTIRE CASE WHEN A LOWER COURT

GRANTS DECLARATORY RELIEF HOLDING A STATE STATUTE UNCONSTITUTIONAL, BUT REFUSES TO ENJOIN FUTURE ENFORCEMENT OF SUCH STATUTE, AND THE APPEAL TO THIS COURT IS FROM THAT PORTION OF THE JUDGMENT DENYING INJUNCTIVE RELIEF.

Should this Court determine that it has jurisdiction to consider the propriety of injunctive relief in this case, it can properly assume jurisdiction of this entire controversy and render a decision on all questions involved in this case, including the constitutionality of the Texas Abortion Laws. Appellee joins Appellants in requesting this Court reach the issue of the Constitutionality of the Texas Abortion Laws. Appellee is in a somewhat awkward procedural position in that it lost on the merits in the lower court as to declaratory relief and neither the grant nor the refusal of a declaratory judgment, without more, will support a direct appeal to this Court under 28 U.S.C. 1253. Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U.S. 427 (1970); Gunn v. University Committee, 399 U.S. 383 (1971). Appellee has the avenue of appeal to the Fifth Circuit.[60] Should this Court in the present case hold that the lower court properly granted declaratory relief but improperly denied injunctive relief, it then might be faced, at least indirectly, with the consideration and decision of the same constitutional issues that are being directly raised by the Appellee in the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit.

Though not directly in point, Public Service Commission of Utah v. Wycoff Co., supra, lends support to the premise that a federal court has the right, power, and authority to decide and determine the entire controversy and all the issues and questions involved in a case of which it has

> "As the validity of provisions of the state constitution and statutes, if they could be deemed to authorize the action of the Governor, was challenged, the application for injunction was properly heard by three judges. Stratton v. St. Louis S. W. R. Co., 282 U.S. 10, 75 L. ed. 135, 51 S. Ct. 8. The jurisdiction of the District Court so constituted, and of this Court upon appeal, extends to every question involved, whether of state or federal law, and enables the *court to rest its judgment on the decisions of such of the questions as in its opinion effectively dispose of the case." (Omitting authority). 287 U.S. at 393-394.

V. ARTICLES 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 AND 1196 OF THE TEXAS PENAL CODE ARE NOT UNCONSTITUTIONAL ON THEIR FACE BECAUSE OF OVERBREATH AND VAGUENESS.

The possible vagueness of state abortion statutes which allow for such a procedure only when the life, or in some cases, health, of the expectant mother is threatened has recently come under judicial scrutiny in a number of instances. One author, in commenting on the decision of the California Supreme Court in People v. Belous, 71 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 (1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970), stated as follows:

> "In attempting to define the phrase 'necessary to preserve . . . life . . .' the California Supreme Court first examined the isolated words of the statute, and concluded that no clear meaning of 'necessary' and 'preserve' could be ascertained. It is not surprising that a seriatim examination of the words convinced the court that the phrase was vague. Necessity is a relative concept and must refer to a particular object to be meaningful. Nor can the word 'preserve' be understood out of context. In > the abstract, such words are not just vague, they are meaningless. Taken in context, however, these words do have meaning. The object of the necessity in this statute is 'to preserve life.' The term is defined by its object—life." 118 U. Penn. L. Rev. 643, 644 (1970).

There is some inherent vagueness in many homicide laws, such as laws which define justifiable homicide as self-defense, or those which differentiate between first- and second-degree murder. The courts, like society, however, have learned to live with a certain element of inevitable vagueness in all laws and have learned to apply it reasonably. See, Lanzetta v. New Jersey, 306 U.S. 451 (1939); Connally v. General Construction Company, 269 U.S. 385 (1926). In order for a statute to be unconstitutionally vague, it must be so vague and lacking in standards so as to compel men of ordinary intelligence to guess at its meaning. Adderley v. Florida, 385 U.S. 39 (1967); Cameron v. Johnson, supra.

A number of three-judge panels have been convened recently to consider the constitutionality of abortion laws which allowed for the performance of such operations only when the life of the mother was threatened by continuance of the pregnancy. While one such court, in dealing with such a law in Wisconsin, did hold the statute to be unconstitutional on other grounds, it said that whatever vagueness existed in the law was not sufficient, of itself, for a declaration of unconstitutionality. Babbitz v. McCann, 310 F.Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970). The court observed:

> "We have examined the challenged phraseology and are persuaded that it is not indefinite or vague. In our opinion, the word 'necessary' and the expression 'to save the life of the mother' are both reasonably comprehensible in their meaning." 310 F.Supp. at 297.

Accord, Rosen v. Louisiana State Board of Medical Examiners, 318 F. Supp. 1217 (E.D. La. 1970).

In United States v. Petrillo, 332 U.S. 1 (1947), this Court stated:

> "There may be marginal cases in which it is difficult to determine the side of the line on which a particular fact situation falls is no sufficient reason to hold the language too ambiguous to define a criminal offense, Robinson v. United States, 324 US 282, 285, 286, 89 L.ed 944, 946, 947, 65 S Ct 666. It would strain the requirement for certainty in criminal law standards too near the breaking point to say that it was impossibly judicially to determine whether a person knew when he was wilfully attempting to compel another to hire unneeded employees. (Omitting authority). 332 U.S. at 7-8.

See Jordan v. DeGeorge, 341 U.S. 223 (1951); United States v. Ragen, 314 U.S. 513 (1942); United States v. Wurzback, 280 U.S. 396 (1930).

The court below did not have the advantage of this Court's decision in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), at the time it handed down its decision in this case. In Vuitch this Court reversed the decision of a district court judge who had found that the District of Columbia abortion law was unconstitutionally vague. The exception clause in Vuitch stated in part "unless the same were done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health".[61] Though this Court directed its attention to the word "health", its holding should be dispositive of the case at bar in that the exception clause is less certain of meaning than the exception found in the Texas Abortion Laws. This Court in Vuitch further disposed of the contention of the physician that once an abortion is performed he is "presumed guilty".

One must recognize the interest of a husband and w in preserving their conjugal relations from state int failed to warn that Mrs. Gleitman was suffering from German measles and this failure deprived the family of the opportunity of terminating the pregnancy. They alleged the child was born with grave defects as a result of the doctor's omission. The court stated as follows:

> "The right to life is inalienable in our society. . . .
> We are not faced here with the necessity of balancing the mother's life against that of her child. The sanctity of the single human life is the decisive factor in this suit in tort. Eugenic considerations are not controlling. We are not talking here about the breeding of prize cattle. It may have been easier for the mother and less expensive for the father to have terminated the life of their child while he was an embryo, but these alleged detriments cannot stand against the preciousness of a single human life to support a remedy in tort." 227 A.2d at 693.

B. PHYSICIAN–PATIENT RELATIONSHIP.

Proponents of abortion-on-demand assert that anti- abortion laws unlawfully intrude into the privacy of the physician-patient relationship. They assume necessarily that the doctor treating a pregnancy owes an obligation of good medical care to only one patient, the pregnant woman. In Jones v. Jones, 208 Misc. 721, 144 N.Y.S.2d 820 (Sup.Ct. 1955), the court stated (concerning an unborn child) as follows:

> ". . . became a patient of the mother's obstetrician, as well as the mother herself. In so holding, I can think of the infant as a third-party beneficiary of the mother-doctor contract or perhaps a principal for whom the mother acted as agent." 144 N.Y.S.2d at 826.

As a patient of the obstetrician, the child may recover damages for a prenatal injury suffered as the result of the negligence of his doctor. Sylvia v. Gobeille, 101 R.I. 76, 220 A.2d 222 (1966); Seattle-First National Bank v. Rankin, 59 Wash. 2d 288, 367 P.2d 835 (1962). It is elemental that a doctor cannot be freed from legal restraints in making socio-moral judgments. The state may regulate the medical profession to protect the health and welfare of all its citizens. See Wasmuth v. Allen, 14 N.Y.2d 391, 200 N.E.2d 756, 252 N.Y.S.2d 65 (1964), appeal dismissed, 379 U.S. 11 (1964); Barsky v. Board of Regents, 347 U.S. 442 (1954). Appellants' contentions of intrusion upon physician-patient relationship are not self-sustaining and must be associated with and connected to a violation of some basic right.

C. THE INTERESTS OF THE WOMAN.

Personal privacy is an exalted right but, as in marital privacy, it has never been regarded as absolute. A person may be subjected to a "stop and frisk" though it constitutes an intrusion upon his person,[66] or a person may be required to submit to a vaccination,[67] and a blood sample may forcibly be extracted from the body of an individual arrested for suspicion of driving while intoxicated.[68] A woman has been required to submit to a blood transfusion necessary to preserve her life in order that her small child shall not be left without a mother.[69] The "right of privacy" is a highly cherished right—however one which is nowhere expressly mentioned in the Constitution of the United States or its amendments. Numerous examples in tort and criminal law indicate the right to privacy is a relative right.[70] A woman cannot in privacy, even though she harm no other person, legally utilize or even possess certain forbidden drugs, such as LSD or herion. The right to privacy was considered a mere relative right by the framers of the Constitution. Had they not considered the right to privacy a mere relative right, they would have carefully defined additional protection for the small portion of the right to privacy protected by the guarantee against unreasonable search and seizure. In Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), referring to searches and seizures, stated that the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States cannot be translated into a general constitutional "right of privacy". See, Lewis v. United States, 385 U.S. 206 (1966).

When the "right of privacy" is attached to an "express right" such as the "right of freedom of religion" a very strong constitutional basis exists for upholding the "right"—except when in conflict with the most basic and fundamental of all rights—the "right to life". In Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Memorial Hospital v. Anderson, 42 N.J. 421, 201 A.2d 537 (1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 985 (1964), the New Jersey Supreme Court was asked to decide just such an issue—a conflict between the mother's privacy and the life of the unborn child. The issue was whether the rights of a child in utero were violated by the pregnant woman's refusal on religious grounds to submit to a blood transfusion necessary to preserve the lives of both the mother and the unborn child. The Court's finding favored the right to life of the unborn child over the pregnant woman's freedom of religion and stated:

> "The blood transfusions (including transfusions made necessary by the delivery) may be administered if necessary to save her life or the life of the child, as the physician in charge at the time may determine." 201 A.2d at 538.

D. THE HUMAN-NESS OF THE FETUS.

The crux of the moral and legal debate over abortion is, in essence, the right of the woman to determine whether or not she should bear a particular child versus the right of the child to life. The proponents of liberalization of abortion laws speak of the fetus as "a blob of protoplasm" and feel it has no right to life until it has reached a certain stage of development.[71] On the other hand, the opponents of liberalization maintain the fetus is human from the time of conception, and so interruption of pregnancy cannot be justified from the time of fertilization. It most certainly seems logical that from the stage of differentiation, after which neither twinning nor re-combination will occur, the fetus implanted in the uterine wall deserves respect as a human life. If we take the definition of life as being said to be present when an organism shows evidence of individual animate existence, then from the blastocyst stage the fetus qualifies for respect. It is alive because it has the ability to reproduce dying cells. It is human because it can be distinguished from other non-human species, and once implanted in the uterine wall it requires only nutrition and time to develop into one of us.

The recent recognition of autonomy of the unborn child has led to the development of new medical specialties concerning the unborn child from the earliest stages of the pregnancy.[72]* Modern obstetrics has discarded the unscientific the concept that the child in the womb is but tissue of the mother. Dr. Liley, the New Zealand pediatrician, who perfected the intrauterine transfusion, has said:

> "Another medical fallacy that modern obstetrics discards is the idea that the pregnant woman can be treated as a patient alone. No problem in fetal health or disease can any longer be considered in isolation. At the very least two people are involved, the mother and her child." Liley, H.M.I.: Modern Motherhood, Random House, Rev. Ed. 1969.

[71]This is given variously as from 12 weeks to 28 weeks of intrauterine life, and some apparently feel it has no life at all until after full-term delivery.

Yet the attack on the Texas statute assumes this discredited scientific concept and argues that abortions should be considered no differently than any medical measure taken to protect maternal health, (see appellant's brief pp. 94-98) thus completely ignoring the developing human being in the mother's womb.

The court has also abandoned that concept in Kelly v. Gregory, 282 App.Div. 542, 125 N.Y.S.2d 696 (1953), wherein the court stated:

> "We ought to be safe in this respect in saying that legal separability should begin where there is biological separability. We know something more of the actual process of conception and fetal development now than when some of the common law cases were decided; and what we know makes it possible to demonstrate clearly that separability begins at conception.
> "The mother's biological contribution from conception on is nourishment and protection; but the fetus has become a separate organism and remains so throughout its life. That it may not live if its protection and nourishment are cut off earlier than the viable stage of its development is not to destroy its separability; it is rather to describe the conditions under which life will not continue." 125 N.Y.S.2d at 697.

It is our task in the next subsections to show how clearly and conclusively modern science—embryology, fetology, genetics, perinatology, all of biology—establishes the humanity of the unborn child. We submit that the data not only shows the constitutionality of the Texas legislature's effort to save the unborn from indiscriminate extermination, but in fact suggests a duty to do so. We submit also that no physician who understands this will argue that the law is vague, uncertain or overbroad for he will understand that the law calls upon him to exercise his art for the benefit of his two patients: mother and child.

From conception the child is a complex, dynamic, rapidly growing organism. By a natural and continuous process the single fertilized ovum will, over approximately nine months, develop into the trillions of cells of the newborn. The natural end of the sperm and ovum is death unless fertilization occurs. At fertilization a new and unique being is created which, although receiving one-half of its chromosomes from each patient, it really unlike either.[73]

About seven to nine days after conception, when there are already several hundred cells of the new individual formed, contact with the uterus is made and implantation begins. Blood cells begin at 17 days and a heart as early as 18 days. This embryonic heart which begins as a simple tube starts irregular pulsations at 24 days, which, in about one week, smooth into a rythmic contraction and expansion.[74] It has been shown that the ECG on a 23 mm embryo (7.5 weeks) presents the existence of a functionally complete cardiac system and the possible existence of a myoneurol or humoral regulatory mechanism. All the classic elements of the adult ECG were seen.[75] Occasional contractions of the heart in a 6 mm (2 week) embryo have been

Commencing at 18 days the developmental emphasis is on the nervous system even though other vital organs, such as the heart, are commencing development at the same time. Such early development is necessary since the nervous system integrates the action of all other systems. By the end of the 20th day the foundation of the child's brain, spinal cord and entire nervous system will have been established. By the 6th week after conception this system will have developed so well that it is controlling movements of the baby's muscles, even though the woman may not be aware that she is pregnant. By the 33rd day the cerebral cortex, that part of the central nervous system that governs motor activity as well as intellect may be seen.[77]

The baby's eyes begin to form at 19 days. By the end of the first month the foundation of the brain, spinal cord, nerves and sense organs is completely formed. By 28 days the embryo has the building blocks for 40 pairs of muscles situated from the base of its skull to the lower end of its spinal column. By the end of the first month the child has completed the period of relatively greatest size increase and the greatest physical change of a lifetime. He or she is ten thousand times larger than the fertilized egg and will increase its weight six billion times by birth, having in only

Shettles and Rugh describe this first month of development as follows:

> "This, then, is the great planning period, when out of apparently nothing comes evidence of a well integrated individual, who will form along certain well tried patterns, but who will, in the end, be distinguishable from every other human being by virtue of ultra microscopic chromosomal differences." By the beginning of the second month the unborn child, small as it is, looks distinctly human. (See Fig. 1). Yet, by this time the child's mother is not even aware that she is pregnant."[79]

As Shettles and Rugh state:

> "And as for the question, 'when does the embryo become human?' The answer is that it always had human potential, and no other, from the instant the sperm and the egg came together because of its chromosomes." (Emphasis in original). Id at p. 40.

At the end of the first month the child is about ¼ of an inch in length. At 30 days the primary brain is present and the eyes, ears and nasal organs have started to form. Although the heart is still incomplete, it is beating regularly and pumping blood cells through a closed vascular system.[80] The child and mother do not exchange blood, the child having from a very early point in its development its own and complete vascular system.[81]

Earliest reflexes begin as early as the 42nd day. The male penis begins to form. The child is almost ½ inch long and cartilage has begun to develop.[82] [See Fig. 2]

Even at 5½ weeks the fetal heartbeat is essentially similar to that of an adult in general configuration. The energy output is about 20% that of the adult, but the fetal heart is functionally complete and normal by 7 weeks. Shettles and Rugh describe the child at this point of its development as a 1-inch miniature doll with a large head, but gracefully formed arms and legs and an unmistakably human face.[83] [See Fig. 2]

By the end of the seventh week we see a well proportioned small scale baby. In its seventh week, it bears the familiar external features and all the internal organs of the adult, even though it is less than an inch long and weighs only 1/30th of an ounce. The body has become nicely rounded, padded with muscles and covered by a thin skin. The arms are only as long as printed exclamation marks, and have hands with fingers and thumbs. The slower growing legs have recognizable knees, ankles and toes." [See Figs. 3 and 4]

The new body not only exists, it also functions. The brain in configuration is already like the adult brain and sends out impulses that coordinate the function of the other organs. The brain waves have been noted at 43 days.[86] The heart beats sturdily. The stomach produces digestive juices. The liver manufactures blood cells and the kidney begins to function by extracting uric acid from the child's blood.[87] The muscles of the arms and body can already be set in motion.[87]

After the eighth week no further primordia will form; everything is already present that will be found in the full term baby.[88] As one author describes this period:

> "A human face with eyelids half closed as they are in someone who is about to fall asleep. Hands that soon will begin to grip, feet trying their first gentle kicks." From this point until adulthood, when full growth is achieved somewhere between 25 and 27 years, the changes in the body will be mainly in dimension and in gradual refinement of the working parts.[89]

The development of the child, while very rapid, is also very specific. The genetic pattern set down in the first day of life instructs the development of a specific anatomy. The ears are formed by seven weeks and are specific, and may resemble a family pattern.[90] The lines in the hands start to be engraved by eight weeks and remain a distinctive feature of the individual.[91] [See Fig. 3]

The primitive skeletal system has completely developed by the end of six weeks.[92] This marks the end of the child's embryonic (from Greek, to swell or teem within) period. From this point, the child will be called a fetus (Latin, young one or offspring).[93] [See Fig. 2]

In the third month, the child becomes very active. By the end of the month he can kick his legs, turn his feet, curl and fan his toes, make a fist, move his thumb, bend his wrist, turn his head, squint, frown, open his mouth, press his lips tightly together.[94] He can swallow and drinks the amniotic fluid that surrounds him. Thumb sucking is first noted at this age. The first respiratory motions move fluid

The movement of the child has been recorded at this early stage by placing delicate shock recording devices on the mother's abdomen and direct observations have been made by the famous embryologist, Davenport Hooker, M.D. Over the last thirty years, Dr. Hooker has recorded the movement of the child on film, some as early as six weeks of age. His films show that prenatal behavior develops in an orderly progression."[96]

The prerequisites for motion are muscles and nerves.
In the sixth to seventh weeks, nerves and muscles work together for the first time."[97] If the area of the lips, the first to become sensitive to touch, is gently stroked, the child responds by bending the upper body to one side and making a quick backward motion with his arms. This is called a total pattern response because it involves most of the body, rather than a local part. Localized and more appropriate reactions such as swallowing follow in the third month. By the beginning of the ninth week, the baby moves spontaneously without being touched. Sometimes his whole body swings back and forth for a few moments.
By eight and a half weeks the eyelids and the palms of the hands become sensitive to touch. If the eyelid stroked, the child squints. On stroking the palm, the finger close into a small fist.[98]

In the ninth and tenth weeks, the child's activity leaps ahead. Now if the forehead is touched, he may turn his head away and pucked up his brow and frown. He now has full use of his arms and can bend the elbow and wrist independently. In the same week, the entire body becomes sensitive to touch.[99] [See Fig. 6.]

The twelfth week brings a whole new range of responses. The baby can now move his thumb in opposition to his fingers. He now swallows regularly. He can pull up his upper lip; the initial step in the development of the sucking reflex.[100] By the end of the twelfth week, the quality of muscular response is altered. It is no longer marionette like or mechanical—the movements are now graceful and fluid, as they are in the newborn. The child is active and the reflexes are becoming more vigorous. All this is before the mother feels any movement.[101] [See Figs. 5 and 7.]

Every child shows a distinct individuality in his behavior by the end of the third month. This is because the actual structure of the muscles varies from baby to baby. The alignment of the muscles of the face, for example, follow an inherited pattern. The facial expressions of the baby in his third month are already similar to the facial expressions of his parents.[102] [See Figs. 5 and 7.]

Further refinements are noted in the third month. The fingernails appear. The child's face becomes much prettier. His eyes, previously far apart, now move closer together. The eyelids close over the eyes. Sexual differentiation is apparent in both internal and external sex organs, and primitive eggs and sperm are formed. The vocal cords are completed. In the absence of air they cannot produce sound; the child cannot cry aloud until birth, although he is capable of crying long before.[103]

From the twelfth to the sixteenth week, the child grows very rapidly.[104] His weight increases six times, and he grows to eight to ten inches in height. For this incredible growth spurt the child needs oxygen and food. This he receives from his mother through the placental attachment—much like he receives food from her after he is born. His dependence does not end with expulsion into the external environment.[105] We now know that the placenta belongs to the baby, not the mother, as was long thought.[106] [See Fig. 8.]

In the fifth month, the baby gains two inches in height and ten ounces in weight. By the end of the month he will be about one foot tall and will weigh one pound. Fine baby hair begins to grow on his eyebrows and on his head and a fringe of eyelashes appear. Most of the skeleton hardens. The baby's muscles become much stronger, and as the child becomes larger his mother finally perceives his many activities.[107] The child's mother comes to recognize the movement and can feel the baby's head, arms and legs. She may even perceive a rhythmic jolting movement–fifteen to thirty per minute. This is due to the child hiccoughing.[108] The doctor can now hear the heartbeat with his stethoscope.[109] [See Figs. 9 and 10.]

The baby sleeps and wakes just as it will after birth.[110] When he sleeps he invariably settles into his favorite position called his "lie". Each baby has a characteristic lie.[111] When he awakens he moves about freely in the bouyant fluid turning from side to side, and frequently head over heel. Sometimes his head will be up and sometimes it will be down. He may sometimes be aroused from sleep by external vibrations. He may wake up from a loud tap on the tub when his mother is taking a bath. A loud concert or the virbations of a washing machine may also stir him into activity.[112] The child hears and recognizes his mother's voice before birth.[113] Movements of the mother, whether locomotive, cardiac or respiratory, are communicated to the child.[114]

In the sixth month, the baby will grow about two more inches, to become fourteen inches tall. He will also begin to accumulate a little fat under his skin and will increase his weight to a pound and three-quarters. This month the permanent teeth buds come in high in the gums behind the milk teeth. Now his closed eyelids will open and close, and his eyes look up, down and sideways. Dr. Liley of New Zealand feels that the child may perceive light through the abdominal wall.[115] Dr. Still has noted that electroencephalographic waves have been obtained in forty-three to forty-five day old fetuses, and so conscious experience is possible after this date.[116]

In the sixth month, the child develops a strong muscular grip with his hands. He also starts to breathe regularly and can maintain respiratory response for twenty-four hours if born prematurely. He may even have a slim chance of surviving in an incubator. The youngest children known to survive were beween twenty to twenty-five weeks old.[117] The concept of viability is not a static one. Dr. Andre Hellegers of Georgetown University states that 10% of children born between twenty weeks and twenty-four weeks gestation will survive.[118] Modern Medical intensive therapy has salvaged many children that would have been considered non-viable only a few years ago. The concept of an articicial placenta may be a reality in the near future and will push the date of viability back even further, and perhaps to the earliest stages of gestation.[119] After twenty-four to twenty-eight weeks the child's chances of survival are much greater.

This review has covered the first six months of life. By this time the individuality of this human being should be clear to all unbiased observers. When one views the present state of medical science, we find that the artificial distinction between born and unborn has vanished. The whole thrust of medicine is in support of the motion that the child in its mother is a distinct individual in need of the most diligent study and care, and that he is also a patient whom science and medicine treats just as it does any other person.[120]

This review of the current medical status of the unborn serves us several purposes. Firstly, it shows conclusively the humanity of the fetus by showing that human life is a continuum which commences in the womb. There is no magic in birth. The child is as much a child in those several days before birth as he is those several days after. The maturation process, commenced in the womb, continues through the post-natal period, infancy, adolescence, maturity and old age. Dr. Arnold Gesell points out in his work that no king ever had any other beginning than have had all of us in our mother's womb.[121] Quickening is only a relative concept which depends upon the sensitivity of the mother, the position of the placenta, and the size of the child. *

VII. THE STATE OF TEXAS HAS A LEGITIMATE INTEREST IN PROHIBITING ABORTION EXCEPT BY MEDICAL ADVICE FOR THE PURPOSE OF "SAVING THE LIFE OF THE MOTHER".

There seems little argument necessary if one can conclude the unborn child is a human being with birth but a convenient landmark in a continuing process—a bridge between two stages of life. The basic postulates from which the Appellees' arguments proceed are: (1) the pregnant woman has a right of control over her own body as a matter of privacy guaranteed to her by the Constitution of the United States; and (2) this right cannot be interfered with by the state since the state cannot demonstrate any compelling interest to justify its intrusion. The contrary position is the state's interest in preventing the arbitrary and unjustified destruction of an unborn child—a living human being in the very earliest stages of its development. Whatever personal right of privacy a pregnant woman may have with respect to the disposition and use of her body must be balanced against the personal right of the unborn child to life.

[121]Gesell, Arnold: The Embryology Of Behavior, supra.

*If the court is interested in the actual medical history on nineteenth century legislative opposition to abortion, it may consult the American Medical Association, 1846-1951 Digest of Official Actions (edited F.J.L. Blasingame 1959), p. 66, where a list of the repeated American Medical Association attacks on abortion are compiled. It will be seen that the great medical battle of the nineteenth century was to persuade legislatures to eliminate the requirement of quickening and to condemn abortion from conception, see Isaac M. Quimby Introduction to Medical Jurisprudence, Journal of American Medical Association, August 6, 1887, Vol. 9, p. 164 and H. C. Markham Foeticide and Its Prevention, ibid. Dec. 8, 1888 Vol. 11, p. 805. It will be seen that the Association unanimously condemned abortion as the destruction of "human life", American Medical Association, Minutes of the Annual Meeting 1859, The American Medical Gazette 1859, Vol. 10, p. 409.

Whatever the metaphysical view of it is, or may have been, it is beyond argument that legal concepts as to the nature and rights of the unborn child have drastically changed, based on expanded medical knowledge, over the last 2,500 years.

In addition to the provisions of 22 D C Code 201,[122] the Congress of the United States has clearly indicated a firm general policy of the Federal government against abortion. 18 U.S.C. 1461 provides in part as follows:

> "Every obscene, lewd, lascivious, indecent, filthy or vile article, matter, thing, device, or substance; and—
>
> Every article or thing designed, adapted, or intended for preventing conception or producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral use; and
>
> Every article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing which is advertised or described in a manner calculated to lead another to use or apply it for preventing conception or producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral purpose; and
>
> Every written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, or how, or from whom, or by what means any of such mentioned matters, articles, or things may be obtained or made or where or by whom any act or operation of any kind for the procuring or producing of abortion will be done or performed, or how or by what means conception may be prevented or abortion produced, whether sealed or unsealed; and

Every paper, writing, advertisement, or representation that any article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing may, or can, be used or applied for preventing conception or producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral purpose; and

Every description calculated to induce or incite a person to so use or apply any such article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing—

Is declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

. . . ." (Emphasis added).

It is most seriously argued that the "life" protected by the Due Process of Law Clause of the Fifth Amendment includes the life of the unborn child. Further, it would be a denial of equal protection of law not to accord protection of the life of a person who had not yet been born but still in the womb of its mother. If it is a denial of equal protection for a statute to distinguish between a thief and an embezzler under a statute providing for the sterilization of the one and not the other,[123] then it is surely a denial of equal protection for either the state or federal government to distinguish between a person who has been born and one living in the womb of its mother.

In Katz v. United States, supra, this Court, after concluding that the Fourth Amendment cannot be translated into a general constitutional "right to privacy" and after making reference to other provisions of the Constitution of the United States protecting personal privacy from other forms of governmental intrusion,[124] stated that ". . . the protection of a person's general right to privacy—his right to be let alone by other people—is, like the protection of his property and of his very life, left largely to the law of the individual States". 389 U.S. at 352. Compare Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77 (1949).

If it be true that the compelling state interest in prohibiting or regulating abortion did not exist at one time in the stage of history, under the result of the findings and research of modern medicine, a different legal conclusion can now be reached. The fact that a statute or law may originally have been enacted to serve one purpose does not serve to condemn it when the same statute, with the passage of time, serves a different but equally valid public purpose. See McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961).

CONCLUSION

For the reasons above stated Appellee submits that the appeal from the judgment of the lower court denying injunctive relief to the Appellants should be affirmed; that this Court consider plenary review of this entire case and reverse the judgment of the court below declaring Articles 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196 of the Texas Penal Code unconstitutional and enter its order accordingly.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR AMICI CURIAE PLANNED PARENTHOOD FEDERATION OF AMERICA, INC. AND AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF PLANNED PARENTHOOD PHYSICIANS

Summary of Argument

Amici, Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. and American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians, submitted a brief amicus curiae to this Court in August of 1971. This supplemental brief is submitted for the purpose of bringing the prior brief up to date as of September 15, 1972 with reference to factual information to which the judicial notice of this Court is respectfully invited, with reference to developments in the applicable law in the past year, and with reference to the arguments as to the rights of the fetus advanced by appellees and various amici in their support subsequent to the filing of our brief.

The facts set forth in Point I relate to the experience under the recent statutes which permit abortion on request in the early stages of pregnancy. These facts support the conclusion reached in the majority of relevant cases decided in the past year (Point II), that no compelling state interest justifies statutes, like those of Texas and Georgia, which infringe the rights of women and doctors in relation to the obtaining and furnishing of abortion services. Indeed, it appears from these facts that compelling state interests require that such restrictions on the performance of abortion be removed.

The argument advanced by the appellees, that restrictive abortion statutes are justified by a compelling state interest in protecting the claimed constitutional rights of the fetus, is without merit (Point III). It is clear from the decisions that the fetus is not a person for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. State cases dealing with the legal rights of the unborn do not support a contrary conclusion. The law has never considered the unborn fetus as having a separate juridical existence. Nor can the basic human rights of women be subordinated to any claimed rights of the fetus.

POINT I

The facts of record during the past year suggest that "compelling state interests" in public health and welfare require the removal of such restrictive abortion laws as those herein challenged.

The attention of the Court is respectfully invited to the following material which was not available at the time we filed our prior brief and which is submitted to supplement Point I of that brief.

A. Background facts

Significant statistics have begun to become available as to the experience under statutes which permit abortion on request in the early stages of pregnancy (such as are in effect in Alaska, Hawaii, New York and Washington). The latest official statistics available to us on the number of legal abortions performed in the United States are those contained in the United States Department of Health, Education and Welfare's Center for Disease Control's Abortion Surveillance Report, Jan.-Mar. 1971 (Mar. 1972). This publication reported a total of 99,721 legal abortions in the United States in the first quarter of 1971, excluding abortions reported by the Department of Defense. The overall abortion ratio for the United States was 110 reported abortions per 1,000 live births (Op. cit.). Every state which reported abortions for both 1970 and the first quarter of 1971 had a higher abortion ratio in 1971.

The fifteen states which reported legal abortions for the first quarter of 1971 reported an overall ratio of 292 abortions per 1,000 live births. This compares with a ratio for reporting states in the previous year of 178 abortions per 1,000 live births. Of particular significance to this case is the fact that of the states reporting, Georgia had the lowest ratio of abortions to live births in both periods. Ibid.

The following table gives a breakdown by states for the first quarter of 1971 (Id. at 2):

TABLE 1: REPORTED LEGAL ABORTION RATIOS BY STATE OF OCCURRENCE, SELECTED STATES,* JANUARY-MARCH 1971

The foregoing figures for New York include abortions performed on non-residents. New York State's official figures for the full calendar year 1971 for both residents and non-residents are available, however. They show a total 262,807 recorded induced abortions for the year 1971, of which 206,673 were performed in New York City. 159,969 of the 262,807 were performed on non-residents. The ratio of legal abortions to live births among residents of New York City was 517 out of per 1,000 live births and for up-state New York residents 226 per 1,000 live births. Report on Induced Abortions Recorded in New York State January-December, 1971, New York State Department of Health (August, 1972) at 1-2.

No meaningful figures are available as to the number of illegal abortions. Estimates of the number of illegal abortions performed annually in the United States have in the past ranged from 200,000 to 1,200,000. Report of the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future (1972) at 102.

The most detailed recent statistics emanate from New York State where more than half of all legal abortions reported in the United States from July 1, 1970 through March 31, 1971 were performed. The New York experience is summarized below together with such information from other states as is available to us.

B. Legal abortions are safer than childbirth.

The overall maternal death rate from legal abortions in New York State dropped to 3.7 per 100,000 abortions in the last half of 1971. This is less than half of the death rate associated with live delivery. The New York Abortion Story, Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., (1972), at 22. See also New York City Health Services Administration Abortion Report, Feb. 20, 1972, at 2. This record, when combined with the decrease in illegal abortions (the major source of maternal mortality) caused the maternal mortality rate in New York City to drop by two-thirds to a record low in 1971, the first full year during which abortions were available on request in New York. Maternal deaths due to criminal abortions in New York City in the 1960's ranged from a high of 130 in 1961 to a low of 66 in 1968. This represented 33 maternal deaths due to criminal abortions per 100,000 live births in 1961 and 15 in 1968. In the first 6 months of 1971 only one maternal death due to criminal abortion was reported. Pakter & Nelson, Abortion in New York City: The First Nine Months, Family Planning Perspectives (July 1971) at 10.

The California experience was comparable. Report of the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future, at 102.

There were no maternal deaths as a result of any of the 3,643 legal abortions performed in Hawaii in the first year after the permissive statute became effective on March 13, 1970. The University of Hawaii, Report to the Legislature: Abortion in Hawaii: The First Year, at 7.

C. Availability of abortion reduces the infant mortality rate.

The 1971 New York State infant mortality rate of 18.7 per 1,000 live births is the lowest rate ever recorded in that state. Report on Induced Abortions Recorded in New York State, supra, p. 2. The New York City rate dropped from 24.4 in 1969, the last full year before the new abortion statute, to 20.7 in 1971. New York City Health Services Administration Abortion Report, supra at 2.

"Neo-natal" mortality (deaths occurring in the first 28 days of life) in New York City dropped from 18.1 percent per 1,000 live births in 1969 to 16.2 percent in 1970 to 14.9 percent in 1971. Report of the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future, at 102.

D. Discrimination against the poor and the non-white is substantially eliminated.

In New York City in 1960/1961 the ratio of therapeutic abortions per 1,000 deliveries was 2.6 for white women, .5 for Negro women, and .1 for Puerto Rican women. Memorandum of Assemblywoman Constance Cook, New York Legislative Annual, 1970, at 241.

During the first nine months under the present New York law (July 1, 1970-March 31, 1971) abortions were performed on New York City residents at the rate of almost 3 for every 10 live births among the City's Puerto Rican community, 4 for every 10 live births among whites and 6 for every 10 live births of black residents. Pakter and Nelson, Abortion in New York City: The First Nine Months, Family Planning Perspectives (July 1971) at 8.

The Hawaiian experience shows that "the family income distribution of abortion patients varies slightly from that of the state. * * * A higher proportion of abortion patients is found in the over $15,000 income bracket than is true for the state as a whole with a corresponding slight underrepresentation in the lower income brackets." University of Hawaii, Report to the Legislature: Abortion in Hawaii: The First Year, at 16-17.

The all-inclusive cost of a first trimester abortion in a free-standing clinic in New York City has dropped to a ge of $145 to $175, complete with contraceptive coun-ing and a post-operative examination. New York City pitals charge approximately $200 for an ambulatory cedure. Late pregnancy terminations are performed hospitals and at an average cost of $325 to $500. The w York Abortion Story, supra at 27. The usual cost of abortion in Hawaii in the first year under the new tute was about $350. Report to the Legislature, supra

12. The cost of criminal abortions is widely understood have been much higher.

No increased risk is associated with the performance of abortions on an out-patient basis whether in a hospital or in a free-standing clinic.

An interim report based on 42,598 records submitted or before June 15, 1971 to the Joint Program for the udy of Abortion (JPSA) derived from 64 participating stitutions in 12 states and the District of Columbia in nnection with abortions performed after June 30, 1970
ntained the finding that

> "Among JPSA patients, there appears to be no increased risk associated with abortions performed on an outpatient basis, whether in a hospital or in a freestanding clinic. Indeed, JPSA patients whose pregnancies were terminated by suction on an outpatient basis had fewer major complications than those whose abortions were performed on an inpatient basis."

ietze & Lewit, Legal Abortions: Early Medical Complica- ons, Family Planning Perspectives (October 1971) at 6,
. Almost one half of all abortions performed in New ork in the last half of 1971 were performed in clinics.
ew York City Health Services Administration Abortion
eport, supra at 1.

F. A substantial number of legal abortions replace criminal abortions.

It is reliably estimated that only 25 percent of le abortions replace live births. Most of the others probe replace illegal abortions. Tietze, The Potential Imp of Legal Abortion on Population Growth in the Uni States, an unpublished report prepared for the Commiss on Population Growth in the United States (1971).

G. Professional and public support of abortion availability

The National Conference of Commissioners on Unifo State Law has adopted a Uniform Abortion Act wh permits abortion on request up to a specified time which thereafter permits abortion if the physician belie that there is a substantial risk of impairing the physi and mental health of the mother or that the child wo have a grave physical or mental defect or if the pregna resulted from rape or incest. The American Bar Asso tion's 307 member House of Delegates approved the U form Act with only 30 dissenting votes on February 1972. New York Times, Feb. 8, 1972, at 39.

The American Medical Association previously in Ju of 1970 had dropped the limitations on the grounds abortion contained in its prior policy statement (subst tially the same limitations as appear in the Georgia stat herein) and stated with reference to abortion that: "T standards of sound clinical judgment, * * * together w informed patient consent should be determinative acco ing to the merits of each individual case"; also that ab tions should be performed "only by a duly licensed physician and surgeon" under procedural limitations not relevant here.

The American College of Obstetricians' and Gynecologists' policy on abortion sanctions abortions on request. The National Council of Obstetrics-Gynecology is among many other important medical associations which support the repeal of restrictive abortion laws.

An opinion survey conducted in 1971 for the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future indicated that half of all Americans believed that abortion should be a matter decided solely between the individuals and their physicians. An additional 40 percent would have permitted abortion under certain circumstances and only 6 percent flatly opposed abortion under any circumstances. Report of the Commission on Population Growth and the American Future, at 103. In a national Gallup poll in January, 1972, 57 percent of those questioned agreed that the "decision to have an abortion should be made solely by a woman and her physician." Thirty-seven percent disagreed and 6 percent had no opinion. For the first time in such national polls a majority of the Roman Catholics interviewed, 54 percent, expressed support of general abortion reform. The New York Abortion Story, Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc. (1972). The latest Gallup poll conducted in June, 1972, the results of which were published by the New York Times on August 25, 1972, show that 64% of the public (including a majority of Roman Catholics) now believe that the decision to have an abortion should be left solely to the woman and her doctor.

The extent of support for the liberal New York abortion statute among voluntary health, welfare, and civic agencies is indicated by the fact that when the first attack on the constitutionality of the statute was launched in December, 1971 (Byrn v. New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, 21 N.Y.2d 194 [1972]), the following agencies filed a joint brief amici curiae in support of the statute:

Association of the Bar of the City of New York
Citizens Committee for Children of New York, Inc.
Citizens Union of the City of New York
Clergy and Lay Advocates for Hospital Abortion Performance (formerly Clergy Consultation Service)
Committee on Public Affairs of the Community Service Society of New York
Federation of Jewish Philanthropies of New York
Federation of Protestant Welfare Agencies, Inc.
New York Academy of Medicine
New York Chapter of the National Organization for Women
New York State Council of Churches
New York Urban Coalition, Inc.
Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc.
Planned Parenthood of New York City, Inc.
State Communities Aid Association (formerly State Charities Aid Association) Women's City Club of New York

H. Summary

Although the collection of data with regard to the relatively recent experience under the permissive abortion statutes in Alaska, Hawaii, New York and Washington is far from complete, the emerging patterns and trends are clear:

(1) Restrictive abortion statutes cannot be justified on health grounds, whether we are speaking of the woman's health or the health of a total population.

(2) Restrictive abortion statutes and practices discriminate heavily against poor people and non-whites in denying them access to safe medical treatment and in severely limiting their right to choose whether or not to bear an unwanted child.

(3) Assuming arguendo that restrictive abortion statutes could be constitutionally sustained on the ground of a compelling state interest in safeguarding the alleged right of a fetus to be born, the evidence shows that such statutes are not even an effective means to that questionable end. As has been estimated, restrictive abortion statutes are widely ignored primarily by resort to illegal abortionists and more recently by travel to jurisdictions where abortions are freely available.

(4) Thus the effect of the new permissive state statutes on public health and welfare has been salutary and the substantive position they reflect is supported by the general public as well as by national spokesmen for the medical profession, the legal profession and many other professional and lay groups throughout the country.

POINT II

The decisions of this Court, the lower federal courts and the state courts during the past year make clear the unconstitutionality of the laws herein challenged.

A. The decision of this Court in Eisenstadt v. Baird

This Court has now on several occasions indicated its view that a woman has a fundamental constitutional right to decide whether or not to have a child. Most recently, in Eisenstadt v. Baird, —— U.S. ——, 92 S. Ct. 1029 (1972), the Court, through Justice Brennan, said:

> "If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child. See Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557, 22 L. Ed. 2d 542, 89 S. Ct. 1243 (1969). See also Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 86 L. Ed. 1655, 62 S. Ct. 1110 (1942); Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 29, 49 L. Ed. 643, 651, 25 S. Ct. 358 (1905)." —— U.S. at ——, 92 S. Ct. at 1038 (footnote omitted) (emphasis in original).

The Baird decision followed logically from the decision of this Court in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), discussed in our prior brief. These decisions build a citadel of privacy around the most intimate aspects of a person's life which state action may not invade. The decisions of the lower courts, discussed below, invalidating state legislation which drastically restricts the right to abortion, are consistent with and indeed follow inevitably from the philosophy of the Griswold and Baird cases.

B. The decisions of the lower federal courts in the past year

There were at least five decisions in the past year by three-judge federal courts holding that a woman has a fundamental right to choose not to bear a child. They are Klein v. Nassau County Medical Center, —— F. Supp. —— (No. 72-C-386) (E.D. N.Y., filed August 24, 1972); Abele v. Markle, —— F. Supp. —— (Civil Action No. B-521) (D. Conn., June 13, 1972); Abele v. Markle, 342 F. Supp. 800 (D. Conn., April 18, 1972); Poe v. Menghini, 339 F. Supp. 986 (D. Kan., March 13, 1972); and Young Women's Christian Association v. Kugler, 342 F. Supp. 1048 (D. N.J., March 1, 1972). See also Vuitch v. Hardy, —— F. Supp. —— (Civil No. 71-1129-Y) (D. Md., June 22, 1972).

In the April Abele v. Markle decision, supra, Judge J. Edward Lumbard held that the Connecticut abortion statute "trespasse[d] unjustifiably" on women's "personal privacy and liberty" in violation of the Ninth Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Judge Lumbard characterized the determination of whether or not to bear a child as "of fundamental importance to a woman," and went on to find that the interests asserted by the state and specifically its asserted interest in the fetus were "insufficient to warrant removing from the woman all decision-making power over whether to terminate a pregnancy."

He also stated:

"* * * The essential requirement of due process is that the woman be given the power to determine within an appropriate period after conception whether or not she wishes to bear a child."

In Young Women's Christian Association v. Kugler, supra, Circuit Judge Forman wrote, "Hence, we hold that a woman has a constitutional right of privacy cognizable under the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to determine for herself whether to bear a child or terminate a pregnancy in its early stages, free from unreasonable interference by the State." 342 F. Supp. at 1072.

In Klein v. Nassau County Medical Center, supra, the court said "* * * It may well be that a still more fundamental right is infringed whenever an attempt is made by statute or rule to deny, or, as here, substantially to interfere with, the pregnant woman's interest in freely determining whether or not to bear a child." Slip opinion at 11. Holding invalid an administrative directive which denied Medicaid to indigent women seeking abortions, the court held that these women could not be "subjected to State coercion to bear children which they do not wish to bear. * * *". Ibid.

In the June Abele v. Markle decision, supra, the court entered a temporary restraining order preventing the state from enforcing the new Connecticut abortion statute as to a particular applicant for abortion, citing Eisenstadt v. Baird, supra, for the proposition that women have a fundamental right to decide whether to bear or beget children.

In Poe v. Menghini, supra, a three-judge court invalidated two provisions of the Kansas abortion law; one required that abortions be performed only in state licensed hospitals accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals and the other prohibited abortion "until the opinions of three (3) duly licensed physicians attesting to the necessity of such termination have been recorded in writing in the permanent records of the hospital," (Id. at 995), both provisions being similar to provisions in the Georgia statute herein attached. The court held that there is "a fundamental right to individual and marital privacy which includes within its scope the right to procure an abortion[.]" Id. at 993. It found that "[t]he JCAH-accreditation provision * * * places an unwarranted limitation upon the exercise of a fundamental right and is, therefore unconstitutional," (Id. at 994), and that "requiring the certification by three physicians in writing of the circumstances necessitating the abortion, violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 996. The decision of the three-judge court with reference to the Kansas statute is equally applicable to the Georgia statute.

To similar effect is Vuitch v. Hardy, supra, a decision on habeas corpus of the United States District Court for the District of Maryland which also indicates the unconstitutionality of the conditions for abortion set forth in the Georgia statute. In the words of the court, "this Court is convinced that a woman does have a constitutionally protected 'fundamental personal right' to such an abortion [citing Griswold and Baird supra] * * " The court held that the requirement that all abortions take place in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission for Accreditation of Hospitals and licensed by the State Board of Health and Mental Hygiene was unconstitutional since it " * * placed an unnecessary burden on the exercise of [a constitutional] right * * *." Slip opinion at 12. Clearly, the Georgia statute here involved is subject to the same constitutional infirmity.

C. The decisions of the state courts in the past year

In addition to the state cases cited in our earlier brief, we respectfully refer the Court to the following which had not been decided or were not available to us at the time we filed our prior brief.

Orange County, Calif., Jan. 9, 1970); Florida v. Sachs (Alachua County Court of Record, Dec. 10, 1971); People v. Anast, No. 69-3-29 (Ill. Cir. Ct., Cook County, July 29, 1970); State v. Ketchum (Mich. Dist. Ct., March 30 1970); Rogers v. Danforth, No. 315512 (Mo. Cir. Ct., St Louis, June 7, 1971); Commonwealth v. Page (Dkt. No 1968-353) (Pa. Ct. Comm. Pl., Centre County, July 23 1970); State v. Munson (S. Dak. 7th Cir. Ct., Pennington County, April 6, 1970). See also State v. Barquet, —— Fla. ——, 262 So. 2d 431 (Feb. 14, 1972); State v. Nixon, No. 9579 (Ct. App., Mich., August 23, 1972); Beecham v. Leahy —— Vt. ——, 287 A. 2d 836 (1972).

POINT III

There is no constitutional right or compelling state interest in the fetus which can render constitutional the violations of women's and physicians' rights entailed by the Georgia and Texas statutes herein challenged.

Since we filed our prior brief, we have seen the briefs filed by appellees and various amici which are based in large part on the claimed constitutional rights of the fetus. Since in our prior brief we did not discuss the state's alleged interest in the fetus in any detail (pp. 43-44), we now address ourselves to the reasons why the contention that the fetus has constitutional rights or any interest here relevant is without merit.

A. It is clear from the decisions of this Court, the lower federal courts, and the state courts that the fetus is not a person for the purposes of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

In United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), this Court upheld the District of Columbia abortion statute against a claim that it was unconstitutionally vague. In so doing, the Court, by necessary implication, rejected the argument that the fetus is a person for purposes of the United States Constitution. Thus, in holding that the statute, which permitted abortion where "necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health" was sufficiently precise under constitutional standards, the Court relied on lower court decisions construing the law as permitting abortions "for mental health reasons, whether or not the patient had a previous history of mental defects." 402 U.S. at 71-72.* It was with this specific construction before it that the Court sustained the statute. Obviously in upholding such a law, the Court had to reject any rights of constitutional or other dimension in the fetus. Indeed, the Court recognized the danger that jurors who believe that all abortions are evil might for that reason vote to convict doctors for performing any abortion but pointed out that there are well-established methods to protect "against any such jury prejudices", e.g., challenges to prospective jurors. Id. at 72, n.7.

Thus at least seven members of this Court—the five Justices who upheld the Vuitch health statute against a claim of vagueness plus the two Justices who dissented on the merits—would permit abortions in cases in which fetuses would be denied constitutional rights if they had any such rights. These seven Justices reached this conclusion de-

* Justices Burger, Black, Harlan, White and Blackmun joined in this aspect of the decision. Justices Douglas and Stewart dissented from the majority's holding that the statute was not void for vagueness. Justices Marshall and Brennan did not reach the merits of the vagueness issue, but instead restricted their views to the jurisdictional question.

 Justice Douglas, dissenting on the merits in Vuitch, found the District of Columbia abortion statute to be unconstitutionally vague. He indicated that problems of vagueness are magnified "where the regulation touches a protected constitutional right * * *. Abortion touches intimate affairs of the family, of marriage, of sex, which in Griswold v. Conn., 381 U.S. 479, we held to involve rights associated with several express constitutional rights and which are summed up in 'the right of privacy.'" Id. at 77-78 (dissenting opinion).

Justice Stewart also dissented on the merits in Vuitch. In his view the statute could be construed to uphold its constitutionality only "by extending the reasoning of the Court's opinion to its logical conclusion" and conclusively presuming "that when a physician has exercised his judgment in favor of performing an abortion, he has, by hypothesis, not violated the statute." Id. at 96, 97 (dissenting opinion).

spite the fact that the Court had before it in Vuitch amici curiae briefs in which it was argued that the fetus is a person for constitutional purposes. As a federal district court recently observed in discussing the Vuitch case, "Nowhere in the majority opinion, the dissenting opinion or the three concurring opinions was there any inference that fetal life was entitled to constitutional protection." McGarvey v. Magee-Womens Hospital, 340 F. Supp. 751 (W.D. Pa., March 17, 1972).

In McGarvey v. Magee-Womens Hospital, the plaintiff, as guardian ad litem for a class of conceived but unborn children, sought to enjoin the defendant-hospital from permitting the use of its facilities for the performance of abortions. Plaintiff claimed that the abortions performed by defendant violated the rights of the fetus under the Fourteenth Amendment and the Civil Rights Act (42 U.S.C.A. 1981 et seq.), and argued that judicial action must be taken to protect the unborn. The court held that the embryo or fetus is not a person or citizen within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment or the Civil Rights Act and granted defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings on the basis of the constitutional rights of the woman. In the words of the court, "nor have we been cited authority that the framers of the Constitution contemplated fetal life or thought of unborn children as persons for purposes of constitutional protection or that Congress had fetal life in mind when it drafted the Civil Rights Act." The McGarvey court also, as indicated above, relied in part on this Court's decision in United States v. Vuitch, supra, and pointed out that "the statute and opinion * * * show that Congress and the Supreme Court have had opportunity to comment on fetal life in constitutional terms." Accordingly, an injunction for the protection of the fetus was denied.

A leading state court case holding that the fetus has no constitutional rights is Byrn v. New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, 21 N.Y.2d 194 (1972). In that case the plaintiff as guardian ad litem for a class of unborn fetuses alleged that the present New York law which permits abortion by a physician on the request of the woman until the 24th week of pregnancy unconstitutionally infringed the rights of fetuses. The Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court had rejected this contention and held that the fetus had no such constitutional rights. This decision was affirmed by the New York Court of Appeals which stated "The issue, a novel one in the courts of law, is whether children in embryo are and must be recognized as legal persons or entities entitled under the state and federal constitutions to a right to life." The Court held that the answer to this question was in the negative.

The McGarvey and Byrn courts, explicitly, and all of the federal and state courts which have declared restrictive abortion statutes unconstitutional, implicitly, have rejected the argument that the fetus is constitutionally protected. These courts have, indeed, denied that the fetus has rights sufficient to constitute that compelling state interest required to justify the abridgment of women's fundamental constitutional rights by statutes such as the two here under review.

B. There is no basis in constitutional history for declaring the fetus a person.

In a century of Fourteenth Amendment litigation amici could find only one instance other than the very recent abortion cases in which the contention has been made that a fetus is a person under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Montana v. Rogers, 278 F. 2d 68 (7th Cir. 1960), aff'd. sub nom. Montana v. Kennedy, 366 U.S. 308 (1961). In that case, plaintiff claimed he was a citizen of the United States because he was conceived in the United States, was the son of a United States citizen mother, was outside of the United States for six months only (during which time he was born outside the United States because the American Consul refused his mother's request to return on the grounds of her pregnancy) and lived in the United States for the next 50 years. Upholding his deportation as an alien, the Court said that his being conceived in and being in utero in the United States was insufficient to confer to him Fourteenth Amendment citizen rights despite his ties to the United States. Until birth no rights existed. The argument for the right of the fetus was apparently not even pressed in this Court which upheld the decision below.

Other courts have responded similarly to the same argument. See, e.g., McGarvey v. Magee-Womens Hospital, quoted supra; Commonwealth v. Page (Dkt. No. 1968-353) (Pa. Ct. Comm. Pl., Centre County, July 23, 1970).

There is evidence elsewhere in the Constitution that "person" applies only to a live born person. The clause requiring a decennial census says "the whole Number of * * * Persons" in each state must be counted. U.S. Const.,

Art. 1, §2, Cl. 3. From the first census in 1790 to the present, census takers have counted only those born. Means, The Phoenix of Abortional Freedom, 17 N.Y.L. Forum 335, 402-403 (1971).

The constitutional status of the fetus was considered by the Governor's Commission appointed to review New York State's Abortion Law (the Froessel Commission). Responding to a lengthy minority report, the majority said:

> "The minority of this Commission virtually base their entire position on the premise that, by modern secular standards, the fetus is at all times a human being, possessed of corresponding legal rights. The premise is clearly fallacious. Let it first be noted that we are in the State of New York, governed by its laws. The differences in views among the early and modern theologians and their followers are of little assistance to us here." Report of the Governor's Commission Appointed to Review New York State's Abortion Law (March 1968) at 13.

C. State law cases dealing with the legal rights of the unborn do not support the contention that the fetus is a person for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Scattered state law authorities have recognized some legal rights in the fetus for some—here irrelevant—purposes. But no reliance can be placed on these tort, blood transfusion, and other cases, decided in other and different contexts, to support the statutes challenged in the instant case, for two reasons: first, the cases establish at most that the state can choose in some circumstances to protect the fetus where the constitutional rights of others are not thereby impaired; and second, they fail to establish that the courts have treated the fetus as a person. The plaintiffs in the Byrn and McGarvey cases, supra, attempted to establish that the fetus was a person for constitutional purposes by citing proof of situations in which the law has recognized fetal life. The courts in both cases found these authorities unpersuasive in resolving the question of whether the fetus must be afforded constitutional protection at all and certainly not constitutional protection which overcomes the rights of the woman.

The state law cases fall into these categories:

1. The transfusion cases:

One New Jersey court ordered blood transfusions to save the life of a nonconsenting Jehovah's Witness and her unborn child. The case did not hold that fetuses have constitutional rights, however, but only that the state, as parens patriae, had power to protect fetuses where the conflicting right in the mother was to practice her religion at the probable expense of her own life. Raleigh Fitkin-Paul Morgan Memorial Hospital v. Anderson, 42 N.J. 421 (1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 985 (1964).

The same court has recently noted the established distinction between religious beliefs (which are absolutely protected) and religious conduct or practices, which must yield to government restraint where compelling state interests such as life and health are involved, citing among other cases those authorizing the vaccination of children and banning the use of snakes in religious ritual. John F. Kennedy Memorial Hospital v. Heston, 58 N.J. 576, 580-1

(1971). The court also pointed out in Heston that the adult Jehovah's Witness involved there (as, no doubt in every case where the patient has sought hospitalization) wanted to live, not die. Id. at 582. Therefore, the court was in effect acting as parens patriae in respect to a woman by helping her to choose between two inconsistent values. Judge J. Skelly Wright in Application of the President and Directors of Georgetown College, Inc., 331 F. 2d 1000, rehearing denied, 331 F.2d 1010 (D.C. Cir. 1964), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 978 (1964), discussed another common thread in these cases; the fact that the woman and family may welcome a court order as both saving the patient's life and excusing the patient and family of any sin by assuming the onus of authorizing the blood transfusions.

The blood transfusion cases provide no basis of support for the proposition that alleged constitutional rights of the fetus can outweigh, not a religious practice threatening the life of woman and fetus, but the fundamental positive constitutional rights of privacy and liberty of the woman. The fact that these courts have ordered blood transfusions in cases involving pregnant women in aid of their life and health as well as the life of the fetus, does not support the argument that the state must or may protect the fetus as a constitutional matter, as against the constitutional rights of the woman.

2. The tort cases:

Nor do wrongful death and other tort cases support the contention that the fetus is a legal person. In Endresz v. Friedberg, 24 N.Y. 2d 478 (1969), for example, the New York Court of Appeals held that there was no right of recovery under the New York wrongful death statute by personal representatives of a stillborn fetus which died as a result of injuries received while en ventra sa mere.

The court in Endresz pointed out that the cause of action was given the born child only to recognize > "the legal right of every human being to begin life unimpaired by physical or mental defects resulting from the negligence of another. The considerations of justice which mandate the recovery of damages by an infant, injured in his mother's womb and born deformed through the wrong of a third party, are absent where the fetus, deprived of life while yet unborn, is never faced with the prospect of impaired mental or physical health." Id. at 483 (emphasis added).

This passage, written in 1969, makes clear that legally the fetus "begins life" at birth. Ibid. Any event which occurs before birth, and which later results in a legal right for the child, creates only a conditional right, which "attaches only upon fulfillment of the condition that the child be born alive." Id. at 486 (citing Keyes v. Construction Serv., 340 Mass. 633, 636) (emphasis added).

As the court said in Endresz,

> "In other words, even if, as science and theology teach, the child begins a separate 'life' from the moment of conception, it is clear that, 'except insofar as is necessary to protect the child's own rights'* (Matter of Roberts, 158 Misc. 698, 699, supra), the law has never considered the unborn fetus as having a separate 'juridical existence' (Drabbels v. Skelly Oil Co., 155 Neb. 17, 22) or a legal personality or identity 'until it sees the light of day.' (Matter of Peabody, 5 N.Y. 2d 541, 547, supra)." 24 N.Y. 2d at 485.

* Meaning a child subsequently born alive.

3. The criminal cases:

State law restrictions on abortions do not support the view that the fetus must be deemed a person or may be given legal rights which negate the constitutional rights of the woman. An examination of state criminal statutes and cases thereunder makes clear that no state considers the fetus a person for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. Amici are aware of no abortion statute which provides that the destruction of the fetus constitutes murder. State cases dealing with the destruction of a fetus show that the courts do not consider the embryo or fetus a person for purposes of legal definition (e.g., Foster v. State, 182 Wis. 298 [1923] [citing, inter alia, Evans v. People, 49 N.Y. 86 (1872)]; Summerlin v. State, 150 Ga. 173 [1920]; Abrams v. Foshee & Wife, 3 Clark 274 [Sup. Ct. Iowa 1856]), irrespective of whether or not in a biological sense there is life in an embryo. E.g., Foster v. State, supra. Furthermore, the penalties for abortion provided for by statute are considerably less severe than those for murder. Thus, the criminal statutes on abortion and the cases construing them, coupled with the cases which have expressly held that the fetus is not a person under statutes defining murder or vehicular homicide are unconsistent with the thesis that abortion is murder and that the fetus is a person for constitutional purposes.

It is also relevant to note that a number of cases have held that in the absence of a special provision, the woman who commits an abortion on herself is not guilty of any criminal offense. See, e.g., Snyder Appeal, 398 Pa. 237, 246 (1960); Moore v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. Rep. 552, 560 (1897); State v. Parm and Viney, 5 Pennewill's Del. R. (21 Del.)

556, 558 (1905); State v. Montifoire, 95 Vt. 508, 512 (1922); Payne v. Louisiana Industrial Ins. Co., 33 So. 2d 444 (Ct. App. La. 1948); Abele v. Markle, 342 F. Supp. 800 (D. Conn., April 18, 1972). Indeed, some states have made the exemption for women from prosecution for abortion explicit in their statute. See, e.g., 12 Vt. Stat. Ann., §101 (1959), and Beecham v. Leahy, —— Vt. ——, 287 A. 2d 836 (1972).

If in fact the fetus were a person entitled to constitutional protection, neither the courts nor the legislatures would have exempted the woman from prosecution. And even in states where under the law the woman may be prosecuted, she almost never is. For example, there appears to be no New York case in which a woman was convicted for having an abortion or being a party to her abortion. People v. Lovell, 40 Misc. 2d 458, 242 N.Y.S. 2d 958 (1963); People v. Vedder, 98 N.Y. 630, at 632 (1885); People v. McGonegal, 136 N.Y. 62, at 76 (1892).

D. The fetus: science and metaphysics

Some of the briefs filed herein are devoted in considerable part to descriptions of scientific evidence with respect to whether or not a fetus is a living "person." Whatever the findings of science and embryology, whether a fetus is a person is, in the words of a prestigious association of physicians, "not a matter of fact"; the answer derives from matters of "religious philosophy and religious principle." VII The Right to Abortion: A Psychiatric View, pp. 218-219 (Group for the Advancement of Psychiatry, 1969). Thus, "whether the fetus is or is not a human being is a matter of definition, not fact; and we can define it any way we wish." Hardin, Abortion or Compulsory Pregnancy? 30 J. Marriage & Family No. 2 (May, 1968). That our society has chosen to define human life as beginning at birth is sufficiently indicated by our method of calculating age. As the New York Court of Appeals said in Endresz v. Friedberg, supra, in commenting on the relation of scientific and theological teaching to law in this area: "The law has never considered the unborn fetus as having a separate juridical existence."

Conclusion

Stripped of all legalisms and argumentation, what the Georgia and Texas statutes do is compel a woman to bear a child she does not wish to have. Her whole life, not to mention the lives of all those connected with her, is affected by such compulsory child-bearing. Except possibly for military service, imprisonment and capital punishment, as to which there are elaborate safeguards, it is difficult to imagine a more drastic restriction on privacy or on the fundamental freedom to control one's body and one's life. The facts we have referred to in our original brief and herein make clear that when abortion is available on the joint decision of the woman and her physician in the early stages of pregnancy, the effect on public health and welfare is not adverse but enormously beneficial according to all measurable indices. Amici once again request that this Court affirm the judgments of the three-judge courts below insofar as they held unconstitutional the limitations in the Georgia and Texas statutes on the grounds for the performance of abortions, reverse the judgment of the Texas three-judge court insofar as it denied injunctive relief, and re verse the judgment of the Georgia three-judge court insofar as it denied injunctive relief and upheld the constitutionality of the residency, consultation, committee approval and joint accreditation requirements of the Georgia law.

FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS

STATEMENT

The instant case was argued before this Court on December 13, 1971. It is a direct appeal from the decision of a three-judge federal panel declaring the Texas abortion law to be unconstitutional but refusing to grant injunctive relief and denying standing to Appellants Doe.

On June 27, 1972, the case was restored to the calendar for reargument. 40 U.S.L.W. 3617. Reargument is scheduled for October 11, 1972.

Several pertinent decisions have been rendered since the submission of Appellants' original brief. This supplemental brief is submitted to inform the Court of those decisions.

REQUEST FOR INJUNCTIVE RELIEF.

As to their request for injunctive relief, Appellants would once again point out that the injunction requested was one against future prosecutions only. Appellant Hallford had not requested injunctive relief to prevent continuation of the state criminal charge pending against him.

THE CONTINUING SITUATION IN TEXAS.

Despite the District Court holding in June, 1970, that the Texas abortion law is unconstitutional, in November, 1971, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals (Texas' highest criminal court), in Thompson v. State, No. 44,071 (Tex. Ct. Crim. App., Nov. 2, 1971), petition for cert. filed, 40 U.S.L.W. 3532 (U.S. March 20, 1972) (No. 71-1200), rendered a decision which directly contradicted that of the District Court. Without interpreting the abortion statute, the Texas court held that the Texas law was not vague. It specifically did not reach the issue of privacy but held that the State has a compelling interest in protecting the fetus through legislation.

Since the District Court refused to grant injunctive relief and since there is now a direct dichotomy between state and federal decisions, Texas physicians continue to refuse to perform abortions for fear of prosecution. During the last nine months of 1971, 1,658 Texas women travelled to New York to obtain abortions. Texas women continue to be unable to obtain abortion procedures in Texas and thereby continue to suffer irreparable injury.

ACTIONS REGARDING ABORTION.

At its 1972 Midyear Meeting, the American Bar Association House of Delegates approved the Uniform Abortion Act as drafted by the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. 58 A.B.A.J. 380 (1972). The Uniform Abortion Act allows termination of pregnancy up to twenty weeks of pregnancy and thereafter for reasons such as rape, incest, fetal deformity, and the mental or physical health of the woman.

The Rockefeller Commission on Population and the American Future has recommended that the matter of abortion should be left to the conscience of the individual concerned. Abele v. Markle, 342 F. Supp. 800, 802 (D. Conn. 1972).

ARGUMENT

I.

RECENT CASES SUPPORT APPELLANTS' CONTENTIONS REGARDING STANDING.

In the oral argument before the three-judge panel, the attorney for Henry Wade, the sole defendant herein, admitted that Appellant Dr. Hallford has standing and that Appellant Roe has standing as an individual and as the representative of the class. (A. 104). The defendent-appellee did not accede standing to John and Mary Doe.

Several recent cases support Appellants' arguments regarding standing.

This Court, in Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), held that Appellee Baird had standing to assert the rights of unmarried persons denied access to contraceptives even though he was not a physician or pharmacist and was not an unmarried person denied access to contraceptives.

Just as Baird was allowed to raise the rights of persons who were affected by the statute but who were not subject to prosecution thereunder, here Appellant Hallford should be allowed to raise, in addition to his own constitutional claims, the claims of women who are vitally affected by the Texas abortion law but not subject to prosecution thereunder.

Young Women's Christian Association v. Kugler, 342 F.Supp. 1048 (D.N.J. 1972), declared the New Jersey abortion laws unconstitutional. Such laws prohibited persons from causing miscarriage "without lawful justification."

Saying that "the alleged deprivations of constitutional rights depend upon the contingency of pregnancy," 342 F.Supp. at 1056, the Court dismissed all the women plaintiffs since none had alleged pregnancy. There is no indication that any had alleged status as persons wishing to give advice or assistance to women seeking abortions.

The Court recognized that all the physician plaintiffs, two of whom had lost their licenses to practice medicine and one of whom was incarcerated at the time of the action, had standing to raise the constitutional questions both on behalf of and pertaining to themselves and their women patients.

The plaintiff physicians alleged that they had been forced to turn away patients seeking advice and information about the possibility of obtaining abortions, as have Dr. Hallford and the class he represents in the instant case. Dr. Hallford and his fellow physicians are also subject to prosecution under the law if they should perform an abortion that a jury finds was not for the purpose of saving the life of the woman.

Dr. Hallford should be recognized to have standing to litigate the constitutional claims of his class of physicians and those of women patients.

In Abele v. Markle, 342 F.Supp. 800 (D. Conn. 1972), the Connecticut anti-abortion statutes were declared to be unconstitutional. Much like the Texas law, the statutes prohibited all abortions except those necessary to preserve the life of the mother or fetus. Prior to the District Court's consideration of the merits the Circuit Court held that pregnant women and medical personnel desiring to give advice and aid regarding abortions had standing to challenge the statute. Abele v. Markle, 452 F.2d 1121 (2 Cir. 1971).

In this Texas case, Appellant Jane Roe was pregnant when the action was filed. Appellants John and Mary Doe in their complaint outlined their desire to actively participate in organizations giving advice and counselling regarding abortions, along with information to specifically assist in securing abortion. (A. 18). Although the Connecticut abortion laws more specifically applied to giving aid, advice, and encouragement to bring about abortion, Texas law is such that Appellants Doe have been effectively stopped from giving such aid, advice, and encouragement for fear of being subjected to prosecution under either 1 TEXAS PENAL CODE art. 70 (1952) as accomplices to the crime of abortion, or 3 TEXAS PENAL CODE art. 1628 (1953) for conspiring to commit the crime of abortion. (A. 19).

Like the Connecticut medical personnel desiring to give advice and aid regarding abortions, Appellants Doe should be recognized to have standing to challenge the Texas law.

In Poe v. Menghini, 339 F.Supp. 986 (D. Kan. 1972), the three-judge panel recognized that two women who were pregnant when the action was commenced and a doctor had standing to challenge certain restrictions applicable to the performance of abortions. In the instant case, Appellant Jane Roe, who was pregnant when the action was commenced, and Appellant Dr. Hallford would correspondingly have standing to challenge the Texas abortion laws.

Beecham v. Leahy, 287 A.2d 836 (Vt. 1972), declared unconsitutional the Vermont abortion law which, like Texas law, made abortion a criminal offense unless the same is necessary to preserve the life of the woman. The Vermont statute stated that the woman was not liable to the penalties prescribed by the section.

The plaintiffs in Beecham were an unmarried pregnant woman who wanted an abortion and a physician who, except for the law, was willing to terminate the pregnancy but who had not done so and who (unlike Appellant Dr. Hallford) was not the subject of pending state criminal action. The Court held that the unmarried pregnant woman had standing but that the physician did not. There is no indication in the opinion as to whether or not the physician sought to adjudicate the rights of his patients, which other cases have allowed.

Regarding the woman the Court said:

> By reducing her rights to ephemeral status without confronting them, the ability of the plaintiff to produce a case or controversy in the ordinary sense is likewise frustrated. She cannot sue the doctor for an action by him that cannot be compelled. She is not herself subject to legal action, by statutory exemption. Yet a very real wrong, in the eyes of the law, exists. . . . Therefore, . . . we declare that she is entitled to proceed in her action founded on her petition. . . .

287 A.2d at 840. Appellant Jane Roe was similarly found by the lower court to have standing. She, too, was pregnant, had sought but been unable to find a physician to terminate the pregnancy, was not subject to state prosecution, and yet had suffered a very real wrong.

II.

THE RIGHT TO SEEK AND RECEIVE MEDICAL CARE FOR THE PROTECTION OF HEALTH AND WELL-BEING IS A FUNDAMENTAL PERSONAL LIBERTY.

As shown in the original brief of Appellants, the Texas abortion law effectively denies Appellants Jane Roe and Mary Doe access to health care.

Although under Texas case law it is not a crime for a pregnant woman to terminate her own pregnancy or to persuade someone else to perform an abortion on her, the Texas law effectively denies her the assistance of trained medical personnel in doing what she is otherwise legally allowed to do.

The Supreme Court of Vermont, in Beecham v. Leahy, supra, observed that:

> On the one hand the legislation, by specific reference, leaves untouched in the woman herself those rights respecting her own choice to bear children now coming to be recognized in many jurisdictions. . . . Yet, tragically, unless her life itself is at stake, the law leaves her only to the recourse of attempts at self-induced abortion, uncounselled and unassisted by a doctor, in a situation where medical attention is imperative.

287 A.2d at 839 (emphasis added).

The woman is guilty of no crime in Texas, although by case law rather than by statute. Tragically, Texas women are effectively prevented from securing the services of a doctor when medical expertise and experience is imperative to avoid such pitfalls as the piercing of the uterine wall and infection. By preventing the availability of medical assistance, the state effectively endangers the health and well-being of citizens in direct contravention of their best interests and fundamental rights.

III.

THE TEXAS ABORTION LAW VIOLATES FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS OF PRIVACY.

As the opinion of this Court in Eisenstadt v. Baird, supra, states:

> If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or begat a child.

405 U.S. 438.

In Vuitch v. Hardy, Civil No. 71-1129-Y (D. Md. June 22, 1972), the Court stated: "However, this Court is convinced that a woman does have a constitutionally protected, 'fundamental personal right' to seek an abortion," citing Griswold and the above language from Eisenstadt.

Y.W.C.A. v. Kugler, supra, resulted in the New Jersey abortion law being declared unconstitutional in part as a violation of rights of privacy.

> The scope of interests found to be constitutionally protected by the Supreme Court demonstrates that it views both the sanctity of the individual's person and his relationships within a family as so vital to our free society that they should be ranked as fundamental, or implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.

342 F.Supp. at 1071.

> Accordingly, we are persuaded that the freedom to determine whether to bear a child and to terminate a pregnancy in its early stages is so significantly related to the fundamental individual and family rights already found to exist in the Constitution that it follows directly in their channel and requires recognition. Whether a constitutional right of privacy in this area is conceptualized as a family right, as in Griswold, as a personal and individual right, or as deriving from both sources is of no significance and applies equally to all women regardless of marital status, for the restriction on abortion by the New Jersey statutes immediately involves and interferes with the protected areas of both family and individual freedom. Hence we hold that a woman has a constitutional right of privacy recognizable under the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments to determine for herself whether to bear a child or to terminate a pregnancy in its early stages, free from unreasonable interference by the State.

342 F.Supp at 1072.

The fundamental impact of the question of abortion on women was emphasized by the Abele Connecticut panel:

> The decision to carry and bear a child has extraordinary ramifications for a woman. Pregnancy entails profound physical changes. Childbirth presents some danger to life and health. Bearing and raising a child demands difficult psychological and social adjustments. The working or student mother must curtail or end her employment or educational opportunities. The mother with an unwanted child may find that it overtaxes her and her family's financial or emotional resources. Thus, determining whether or not to bear a child is of fundamental importance to a woman.

342 F.Supp. at 801 (emphasis added).

As the lower Court found in the instant case, the Texas abortion law must be declared unconstitutional because it deprives women of their right, secured by the Ninth and Fourteenth Amendments, to choose whether or not to carry a pregnancy to term.

IV.

THE TEXAS STATUTE DOES NOT ADVANCE ANY STATE INTEREST OF COMPELLING IMPORTANCE IN A MANNER WHICH IS NARROWLY DRAWN.

The legislative purposes that the Texas abortion law was meant to serve are not altogether clear. No legislative history specifically applicable to Texas is available.

Appellee during the oral argument before the lower court said the State has only one interest, that of protecting the unborn (A. 104-05). Appellee's brief and Dec. 13th argument before this Court advance no other State interest.

It is important to note that Appellee gives no authority whatsoever that even tends to establish that the purpose of the Texas legislature in adopting the abortion law was in fact what Appellee suggests.

On the other hand, Appellants' original brief establishes that the legislative purpose in other states was to protect the pregnant woman from the dangers of antiseptic surgery.

Further Watson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 237 (Tex. Crim. App. 1880), states that the woman is the victim of the crime of abortion.

People v. Nixon, Dkt. No. 9579 (Ct. App. 2 Div., Aug. 23, 1972), involved a challenge to the constitutionality of the Michigan abortion statute making criminal actions to terminate a pregnancy unless the same was necessary to preserve the life of the woman. The Court concluded that the "so-called 'abortion' statute was not intended to protect the 'rights' of the unquickened fetus" but rather that the obvious propose was to protect the pregnant woman.

The Court pointed out that the woman was not subject to prosecution for self-induced abortion and concluded:

> . . . it must be assumed that the harm the statute was attempting to punish ran only to the woman and not to the fetus. If the statute were intended to protect the continued existence of the fetus, then there would be no reason for exempting the woman from prosecution.

Opinion at 4, n.9.

Similarly, since self-abortion is not a crime in Texas, it is not logical to assume that the purpose of the legislature in passing the so-called "abortion" law was to protect the fetus. It is logical that the legislative purpose was to protect the woman and her health.

Appellants' original brief establishes that the Texas abortion law no longer serves to protect the health of the pregnant woman; in fact it is a hindrance to health.

Even if Appellee could establish that the legislative purpose of the Texas abortion law was to protect the life of the unborn, the state certainly cannot meet its burden of proving that the statute now has a compelling interest in such regulation nor that the law is sufficiently narrow.

The fetus, as such, is not and never has been protected in Texas, with the possible exception of the abortion statutes. In Texas, the so-called protections for the "unborn child" are dependent on the live birth of the child. Thus under Texas law, once born a child may have rights retroactive to the time prior to birth but such rights are meant to benefit those who have survived birth.

Under the criminal laws of Texas, the fetus is given little protection. Self-abortion is not a crime, and the pregnant woman who seeks or receives the help of others in terminating her pregnancy is guilty of no crime. Even the severity of the penalty for another having performed an abortion depends upon whether or not the woman consented to the procedure.

To destroy the life of a fetus has never been considered as homicide in Texas. In order to obtain a murder conviction, the state must " . . . prove that the child was born alive; (and) that it had an existence independent of the mother. . . ." Harris v. State, 28 Tex. App. 308, 309, 12 S.W. 1102, 1103 (1889). In Wallace v. State, 7 Tex. App. 570, 10 S.W. 255 (1880), the mother strangled her child with string. The court overturned her murder conviction, saying that the state failed to prove either that the child was born live or that the actual childbirth process had been completed before the child was killed.

Texas courts are not alone in following the common law rule that a child must be born alive to be the subject of the crime of murder. State v. Dickinson, 28 Ohio St. 2d 65, 275 N.E.2d 599 (1971); Keeler v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 3d 619, 470 P.2d 662, 87 Cal. Rptr. 481 (1970); Clark v. State, 117 Ala. 1, 23 So. 671 (1898); Abrams v. Foshee, 3 Clark 274 (Iowa 1856). In those cases where a person has actually been convicted of a crime for causing the death of a fetus, it has not been under the regular homicide statute but under some special statutory provision, such as a feticide statute. Most feticide statutes have as one of their essential elements a malicious intent to kill the mother. Passley v. State, 194 Ga. 327, 21 S.E.2d 230 (1942); State v. Harness, 280 S.W.2d 11 (Mo. 1955). An intent to cause a miscarriage without an intent to kill the woman would not be sufficient to sustain a conviction of feticide. The penalties under such statutes are also generally lighter than those prescribed by the homicide laws.

Viewed from another angle, there are ironical contradictions between some Texas criminal laws and the abortion law. As stated in Abele v. Markle, supra, "(t)he statutes force a woman to carry to natural term a pregnancy that is the result of rape or incest. Yet these acts are prohibited by the state at least in part to avoid the offspring of such unions." 342 F.Supp at 804.

Similarly, Texas makes rape and incest criminal offenses, 2A TEXAS PENAL CODE, art. 1183 at 372 (1961), and 1 TEXAS PENAL CODE, art. 495, at 553 (1952), and prohibits the marriage of persons closely related, TEXAS FAMILY CODE section 2.21, at 17 (1971). Persons who have any infectious condition of syphilis or other veneral disease cannot obtain a marriage license. TEXAS FAMILY CODE, sections 1.21, at 9, and 1.31 at 11 (1972).

The fetus gets no more protection under Texas tort laws than it does under Texas criminal laws. The Texas courts did not recognize a right to recover for injuries received prior to birth until 1967 (113 years after the Texas abortion law was enacted) in Leal v. C.C. Pitts Sand and Gravel, Inc., 419 S.W.2d 820 (Tex. 1967). Leal involved a wrongful death action brought by the parents of a child who died two days after birth as the result of pre-natal injuries received in an automobile collision. In allowing the wrongful death action, the Texas Supreme Court held that the child, had it lived, could have maintained an action for damages for the pre-natal injuries.

In Delgado v. Yandell, 468 S.W.2d 475 (Tex. Civ. App. 1971), appr. per curiam, 471 S.W.2d 569 (1971), the Texas Supreme Court approved the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals that a cause of action does exist for pre-natal injuries sustained at any pre-natal stage provided the child is born alive and survives. The damages in such a case are not paid to the fetus; they are compensation to a living child for having to spend all or a part of his life under a disability caused prior to birth by another's wrongful act.

Thus the claimed "rights" of the fetus in the tort area are actually rights which may only be exercised by a live child after birth or are the right of bereaved potential parents to be compensated for their loss.

Though much has been written concerning the property rights of the fetus, these rights are really legal fictions which have developed to protect the rights of living children. In order to receive the benefit of its supposed rights, the fetus must be born alive. There has never been a case in Texas where a fetus which was stillborn or destroyed through miscarriage or abortion has been treated as a person for the purpose of determining property rights. When certain kinds of inheritances are involved, even unconceived children can be considered to have some property "rights" in that they may receive a legacy on their subsequent birth. Byrn v. New York City Health & Hospitals Corp., No. 210 72 (Ct. App. 1972). However, this has not prevented the United States Supreme Court from finding a constitutional right on the part of a woman to practice contraception. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965).

There are other areas where Texas does not treat a fetus as a person. For example, under the rules of the Texas Welfare Department, a needy pregnant woman cannot get welfare payments for her unborn child. The state compels the birth of the child, yet does not provide the assistance often needed to produce a healthy child.

Texas does not regard the fetus as a person and has made no attempt to put the fetus on an equal footing with a living child.

Several courts have recently dealt directly with the question of whether the fetus is a person within the meaning of the United States Constitution. Arguably this Court's opinion in Vuitch implicitly rejected the claim that the fetus is a person under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

McGarvey v. Magee-Womens Hospital, Civil Action No. 71-196 (W.D.Pa. Mar. 17, 1972), held that the embryo or fetus is not a person or citizen within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment or the Civil Rights Act.

In Byrn v. New York City Health & Hospitals Corp., supra, the issue was whether children in embryo are and must be recognized as legal persons or entities entitled under the State and Federal Constitutions to a right to life. The Court's conclusion was that the Constitution does not confer or require legal personality for the unborn.

The Appellee has failed to produce any authority for the proposition that the fetus is considered a person under the Constitution. There is evidence in the Constitution that "person" applies only to a live born person. The clause requiring a decennial census says "the whole Number of * * * Persons" in each state must be counted. U.S. Const. Art. I, § 2, Cl. 3. From the first census in 1790 to the present, census takers have counted only those born. Means, The Phoenix of Abortional Freedom, 17 N.Y.L. Forum 335, 402-03 (1971).

Although on its face, the Texas abortion law applies any time after conception, the Brief for Appellee submitted to this Court at page 30 states:

> It most certainly seems logical that from the stage of differentiation . . . the fetus implanted in the uterine wall deserves respect as a human life.

Here Appellee seems to suggest that the law should apply instead only after implantation. Yet on page 32 Appellee devotes a paragraph to describing the "child" during the seven to nine days before implantation. During oral argument Appellee suggested that Texas hospitals intervene to terminate pregnancy when a rape victim is brought in (Tr. 47-48), although there is no exception for rape in the Texas statute.

Appellee's ambivalence is but one indication that the statute does not evidence a compelling interest which could not be protected by less restrictive means.

V.

THE TEXAS ABORTION LAW IS UNCONSTITUTIONALLY VAGUE.

In Thompson v. State, supra, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals upheld the conviction of a physician who allegedly had performed an abortion. The court held, relying on United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62 (1971), that the Texas abortion law was not vague.

The Court in Thompson erred. Whether or not a statute is vague is to be determined from the standpoint of the person who is considering performing an act. The Supreme Court in Vuitch emphasized that a doctor's day-to-day task was one of consideration for the health of his patients; the District of Columbia statute allowed physicians to act to preserve the life or health of patients. Texas, however, allows physicians to act only when necessary to protect life; that is not the sort of criteria physicians are accustomed to dealing with. From the physician's standpoint, as the District Court in this case pointed out, there are many uncertainties inherent in the language of the statute. Vuitch is not authority for upholding the Texas abortion law.

Further, in Vuitch the Court upheld the D. C. statute as interpreted by lower courts to include both mental and physical health. In Texas there has been no interpretation of the Texas statute. Thompson does not even discuss application of the statute.

Recent decisions have declared laws in New Jersey and Florida to be unconsitutionally vague. In Y.W.C.A. v. Kugler, supra, a federal panel declared vague the New Jersey statute against performing an abortion "without lawful justification." Florida's statute against performing an abortion "unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of the mother" was declared unconstitutionally vague by the Florida Supreme Court in State v. Barquet, 262 So.2d 431 (1972).

The Florida court stated that "if the statutes contained a clause reading 'necessary to the preservation of the mother's life or health' instead of the clause 'necessary to preserve the life,' the statutes could be held constitutional. . . ." 262 So.2d at 433.

Chaney v. Indiana, No. 1171 S 321 (Ind. July 24, 1972), however, rejects the vagueness arguments as to a non-medical person.

VI

THE TEXAS ABORTION LAW PLACES AN UNCONSTITUTIONAL BURDEN OF PROOF ON THE PHYSICIAN.

Appellant's original brief details the unconstitutionality of placing upon the physician charged with allegedly performing an abortion the burden of showing that the procedure was necessary for the purpose of saving the life of the woman. Although the burden of proof issue was not before them, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals in a footnote in Thompson, supra, recognized that the Vuitch case does call into question the validity of Texas' statutory scheme as to who has the burden of proof on the exemption.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated in Appellants' original brief and this supplemental brief, this Court should reverse the lower court's judgment denying standing to Appellants Doe and denying injunctive relief; declare that the Texas Abortion Statutes, Arts. 1191, 1192, 1193, 1194 and 1196, TEXAS PENAL CODE, violate the United States Constitution; and remand with instructions that a permanent injunction against enforcement of said statutes be entered.

The organizations and named individuals whose names are appended here respectfully move for leave to file a brief amici curiae in these cases. The attorneys for appellants in both cases and for appellant-intervenor in the Texas case have consented to the filing of this brief. The respective attorneys for the appellees have not so consented.

THE CALIFORNIA COMMITTEE TO LEGALIZE ABORTION is an organization consisting of approximately 5,000 individuals organized into chapters throughout the State of California and dedicated to the cause of removing the State's intervention in the decisions of pregnant women to obtain abortions. The California Committee to Legalize Abortion engages in activities which include preparation and circulation of petitions, one such initiative petition bearing approximately 300,000 signatures from California citizens requesting that a measure be placed on the California ballot to remove the State's intervention process in current California abortion law.

THE SOUTH BAY CHAPTER OF THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION FOR WOMEN is located in the San Francisco Bay Area, California, as an affiliate of the National Organization for Women, a civil rights organization founded in 1966 and with approximately 20,000 members throughout the United States. The South Bay Chapter was founded in 1970 and consists of approximately 300 members dedicated to active work in bringing women into the mainstream of society and affirming a belief in the basic human right to limit one's own reproduction, including women's civil right to abortion.

ZERO POPULATION GROWTH, INC., is a national organization dedicated to achieving population stabilization by voluntary means. Founded in 1969, Zero Population Growth, Inc., (ZPG) has 300,000 members in 300 active chapters throughout the United States. The organization favors the recommendation on abortion contained in the 1972 Report of the President's Commission on Population Growth and the Future.

The concern of amici, CHERIEL MOENCH JENSEN and LYNETTE PERKES, stems from their desire to be single whole individuals, unencumbered by a pregnant condition and in full control of their physical destiny. The necessity of Lynette Perkes to participate fully in her marriage, coupled with the frequency of contraceptive failure (already experienced twice), precludes her right to be secure in a non-pregnant condition. The concern of Cheriel Moench Jensen stems from her need to be as reliable and promising a professional person as the men with whom she must compete. As long as normal married life puts her at constant threat of having her capacity to work and to earn a living suspended by unintended pregnancy and childbearing, she cannot enter into financial or professional commitments with the same confidence as a man.

Each of the organizations and individuals urges upon the Court the position that laws restricting or regulating abortion as a special procedure violate the Thirteenth Amendment by imposing involuntary servitude without due conviction for a crime and without the justification of serving any current national or public need.

Amici believe that this brief raises aspects of constitutional issues before this Court hitherto unexplored by the parties, and that the expressions herein will be of assistance to the Court in the decisions of importance now before it.

For these reasons, we respectfully request leave to file the within brief Amici Curiae.

Respectfully submitted,

JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction has been stated in appellants' briefs and is not repeated herein.

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE.

The interest of Amici Curiae has been set forth in the accompanying motion to file this brief and need not be reiterated here.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

Despite the numerous issues involved in these cases, this brief will address itself only to one, so as to avoid repetition of the arguments presented by appellants and by other briefs of amici curiae. We believe that the time is ripe for this Court to announce that the laws which restrict or regulate abortion as a special procedure violate the Thirteenth Amendment by imposing involuntary servitude without due conviction for a crime.

Although the Texas abortion laws permit abortion only in the single instance where the mother's life would be saved and the Georgia laws permit abortion in certain additional categories, both, in the view of Amici, involve rights of unwillingly pregnant women that make it appropriate to treat the particular issue, to which this brief addresses itself, as being the same in both cases.

ARGUMENT: LAWS WHICH RESTRICT OR REGULATE ABORTION AS A SPECIAL PROCEDURE VIOLATE THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT BY IMPOSING INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE WITHOUT DUE CONVICTION FOR A CRIME.

I. UNDER THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT A WOMAN HAS THE RIGHT TO FREEDOM FROM THE INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE OF PREGNANCY AND CHILDBEARING IN THE ABSENCE OF DUE CONVICTION FOR A CRIME.

A. Scope and Application of the Thirteenth Amendment.

The Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution provides:

> Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

The Amendment, by its very language, prohibits both slavery and involuntary servitude, and requires due conviction of a crime as a condition precedent to all forms of involuntary servitude regardless of racial contexts.

From the outset, the Amendment has been interpreted by this Court to apply to all persons without regard to race or class, and to guarantee universal freedom in the United States.

The first cases on the Amendment, the early Civil Rights Cases of 1883, 109 U.S. 3, interpreted the Amendment as establishing two principles: (1) the prohibition of all forms of involuntary servitude and slavery, and (2) a guarantee of universal freedom to all persons. The Civil Rights Cases found that just as the opposite of "slavery" is freedom, so this Amendment, by abolishing the conditions of slavery and involuntary servitude, established "freedom" throughout the United States by implication. This Court construed the Amendment as "establishing and decreeing universal civil and political freedom throughout the United States." (Id. at 20)

> By its own unaided force and effect it abolished slavery, and established universal freedom . . . for the amendment is not a mere prohibition of state laws establishing or upholding slavery, but an absolute declaration that slavery or involuntary servitude should not exist in any part of the United States. (Id. at 20)

Application of the Amendment has never been limited to racial contexts. As this Court stated in Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U.S. 219, 240-241 (1910):

> While the immediate concern was with African slavery, the Amendment was not limited to that. It was a charter of universal civil freedom for all persons, of whatever race, color, or estate, under the flag. . . . The plain intention was to abolish slavery of whatever name and form and all its badges and incidents; to render impossible any state of bondage; to make labor free, by prohibiting that control by which the personal service of one man is disposed of or coerced for another's benefit, which is the essence of involuntary servitude.

The Thirteenth Amendment prohibits many forms of compulsory labor, i.e., involuntary servitude of all kinds. As defined by this Court, involuntary servitude is "a condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another." Hodges v. United States, 203 U.S. 1, 16 (1906).

Laws compelling personal service in liquidation of a debt or other obligation are null and void as violations of the Thirteenth Amendment. Bailey v. Alabama, supra; Clyatt v. United States, 197 U.S. 207 (1905); Pollock v. Williams, 322 U.S. 4 (1944). Statutes imposing criminal penalties on laborers who fail to perform work necessary to pay off advance wages from a prospective employer are void as violative of the Thirteenth Amendment, the undoubted aim of the Amendment being, "not merely to end slavery but to maintain a system of completely free and voluntary labor throughout the United States." Pollock v. Williams, supra at 17.

As conditions and values change, constitutional language takes on new meanings, because constitutional concepts are not static, "not shackled to the political theory of a particular era." Harper v. Virginia State Board of Education, 383 U.S. 663, 669 (1966). The Thirteenth Amendment, as revived by this Court with new force in Jones v. Mayer, 392 U.S. 409 (1968), reconsidered the early interpretation of the Amendment as set forth in The Civil Rights Cases of 1883, supra. In Jones v. Mayer, supra, the Court stated, at 443:

> At the very least, the freedom that Congress is empowered to secure under the Thirteenth Amendment includes the freedom to buy whatever a white man can buy, the right to live wherever a white man can live. If Congress cannot say that being a free man means at least this much, then the Thirteenth Amendment made a promise the Nation cannot keep.

In Jones v. Mayer, supra, this Court was not reluctant to recognize within the Thirteenth Amendment the "promise of freedom," turning the focus again from what the Amendment prohibits to what it guarantees, a broader principle of freedom from compulsory service of one person to another. (Note, The New Thirteenth Amendment: A Preliminary Analysis, 82 HARVARD L. REV. 1264, 1307 [1969].)

From time to time, this Court has recognized certain exceptions to the Thirteenth Amendment in the interests of serving compelling national or public needs, e.g., military service, jury duty, confinement of the mentally ill (see the cases cited under Section II. B. herein); each time surrounding the exception with safeguards to insure individual rights.

It is the purpose of this brief to show that anti-abortion laws, which force an unwillingly pregnant woman to continue pregnancy to term, are a form of involuntary servitude without the justification of serving any current national or public need.

B. Involuntary Pregnancy and Childbearing as Involuntary Servitude.

1. PREGNANCY: A STATE OF PHYSICAL SERVITUDE.

Pregnancy is not a mere inconvenience. "The physical and functional alterations of pregnancy involve all the body systems,"[1] displacing body parts, depleting the body of its necessary elements and changing its chemical balance.

The pregnant woman's body is in a state of constant service, providing warmth, nutrients, oxygen and waste disposal for the support of the conceptus.[2] These activities are always to the detriment of the woman's body. They are performed for the benefit of the conceptus alone unless an interest of the pregnant woman is also served thereby, that is, unless the pregnant woman defines the pregnancy as wanted.

a. Changes due to the physical invasion of the pregnant woman's body.

During pregnancy, enlargement of the uterus within the abdominal cavity displaces and compresses the other abdominal contents including the heart, lungs and gastro-intestinal tract. The resulting pressure has a direct effect on circulation of the blood and increase in venous pressure, sometimes leading to irreversible varicose veins and hemorrhoids

2. Amici use the term "conceptus" in this section because it is the only medical term which covers the uterine contents in all stages of pregnancy. Hereinbelow, in Section II. C. of this brief, the term "fetus" is used because it is the term of legal familiarity. In all cases, amici continue to mean the uterine contents at all stages of pregnancy.

and, with predictable frequency, to disabling thrombophlebitis.[3] The gastro-intestinal tract experiences functional interference causing constipation and displacement of the urinary tract, thus urinary tract infections occur in six to seven per cent of all pregnant women and such infections, in turn, lead to kidney infections. During the second and third months, bladder irritability is quite constant. Tearing and overstretching of the muscles of the pelvic floor occurs frequently during delivery, causing extensive and irreparable damage to the pelvic organs and their supporting connections. Surgery is often required to return these organs to position. Bladder control may be permanently lost.[4] The weight of the contents of the uterus causes sacroiliac strain accompanied by pain and backache, with the effects of the pressure being felt as far as the outermost extremities of the woman's body. The weight causes such pressure on the cervical spine as to result in numbness, tingling and proprioceptive acuity reduction in the hands.[5]

b. Results of metabolic alteration of the pregnant woman's vital systems.

During pregnancy estrogen levels exhibit severe increase, this phenomena accounting for the symptoms of nausea and vomiting occurring in one-half or more of all pregnant women. If this condition is prolonged, hospitalization is required. Evacuation of the contents of the uterus results in immediate and dramatic relief of symptoms. In severe cases blood protein may be destroyed. Bodies of women who have died from this condition exhibit the symptoms of starvation, acidosis, dehydration and multiple vitamin deficiencies.[6]

The excess progesterone produced by the placenta causes fluid retention, increase in blood pressure, weight gain, irritability, lassitude, severe emotional tension, nervousness, inability to concentrate, and inability to sleep.[7] At least 40 per cent of pregnant women have symptomatic edema, distorting the hands, face, ankles and feet.[8] A woman's lungs respire 45 per cent more air than normal in an attempt to obtain the needed oxygen, but oxygen absorbed is less than normal despite the extra effort of the crowded lungs.[9]

c. Depletion of the pregnant woman's calcium and iron.

Because the conceptus utilizes almost twice as much calcium as the pregnant woman can assimilate from administered and dietary calcium, extra calcium must be drawn from a woman's calcium stores, mostly from her long bones. Thus, the pregnant woman is likely to suffer leg cramps.[10] In young women, permanent bone deformation results.

Total loss of a woman's iron stores during pregnancy and delivery is measured at 680 mg. Thus anemia of pregnancy is high and almost all pregnant women, especially those having repeated pregnancies, require supplementary iron.[11]

Efforts to correct this condition may fail because many pregnant women cannot tolerate iron supplements.

With such extensive effects, can pregnancy be considered as merely a "natural" state of being?[12]

2. INVOLUNTARY PREGNANCY.

Amici ask this Court to consider the lack of options open to the pregnant woman at the time of onset of her pregnancy.

a. Contraceptive failure.

Contraceptives are never foolproof. Any act of intercourse between a fertile man and woman constitutes some risk of conception, no matter what contraceptives are used. One woman in five using the most effective contraceptive available, the combined oral contraceptive "pill," will have one unplanned pregnancy during her 25 reproductively susceptible years.[13] Many women cannot take the "pill" because of its side effects. The second most effective device is the intrauterine shield. With this device in place, one woman in three will have one unwanted pregnancy. (The tolerance rate among women using this device is 96 per cent.[14] Intra-

Failure rates are: combined oral contraceptives, 0.7 per cent; sequential oral contraceptives, 1.4 per cent; intrauterine loop, 2.7 per cent; the double-coil intrauterine device, 2.8 per cent. Each average woman has 25 reproductively susceptible years. Multiply 25 years × device failure rate per 100 woman years. Example: 25 years × 1.4 failures per 100 woman years due to sequential pill = 35 per cent chance per woman, meaning one woman in three having one failure during her lifetime due to the use of the sequential pill. Figures for "the pill" include only those failures resulting from the drug properties. They do not include forgetfulness.

14. Davis, The Shield Intrauterine Device, 106 AM. J. OBST. & GYNEC. 456 (Feb. 1, 1970).

uterine devices are not normally prescribed for women who have not already given birth.) The death rate associated with the use of either of these devices is about the same—three per 100,000 woman users per year;[15] or put another way, one woman in 1,300 using either of these methods will die as a result. Among women taking the "pill," one in 80 will suffer blood clotting requiring hospitalization.[16]

The diaphragm results in three failures per woman over her 25-year reproductive life span. Other methods (foam, jellies, rhythm, condoms) are far less reliable.[17]

If 100,000 women who do not wish to become pregnant take the pill, three will probably die within the year and 1,000 will become pregnant.

Using these figures as a basis, a far safer method can be postulated. If these 100,000 women use the diaphragm, resulting in 12,000 pregnancies which are then legally terminable with abortion, the total death risk to these 100,000 women then becomes 0.36 per 100,000 women. The laws under consideration do not allow women to reduce their risks in this way.[18]

Failure rates for the diaphragm = 12 per 100 woman years (three per fertile woman lifetime); the condom = 14 per 100 woman years (3.5 per fertile woman lifetime); withdrawal = 18 per 100 woman years (4.5 per fertile woman lifetime); rhythm = 24 per 100 woman years (6.0 per fertile woman lifetime).

Westoff[19] reports that one-fifth of all pregnancies studied were unwanted. The magnitude of the problem then is very large, affecting most women in substantial ways.

Under the present state of contraceptive failure, a woman does not have the option of remaining free of pregnancy by making careful use of contraceptives. She is at some risk in using the most effective methods of contraception available.

b. Limitations on the right to refuse.

The average married woman expects to bear two to three children,[20] yet coitus takes place between a couple married during the period of the woman's reproductive years (age 18 to 43) an average of 2,535 times.[21] The frequency of coitus stated in the Kinsey Report is average behavior between married couples. If the woman wishes to remain free of pregnancy once her desired family size is reached, her only sure method of remaining so free of pregnancy is complete abstinence from sexual intercourse. If she embarks on such a course, will the law uphold her decision?

A wife has no legal power to refuse to participate in the intimacies of married life. If she refuses her husband's forced attentions, there is no law to intervene in her behalf. She cannot charge her husband with rape. Indeed, if a married woman attempts to practice abstinence, the laws of most states treat her behavior as a denial of the marital right of the husband. Some jurisdictions construe refusal of sexual relations as desertion and thus ground for divorce. This is the law in Georgia under Ga. Code Ann. Sec. 30-102. (See also, Whitfield v. Whitfield 89 Ga. 471, 15 S.E. 543 [1892].) In some other jurisdictions, desertion is held to occur upon cessation of sexual relations notwithstanding that the spouses continue to take meals together, converse and in other ways behave as husband and wife.[22] In some other states in which cruelty is a ground, such refusal constitutes cruelty, giving the husband cause for divorce. In the states now recognizing "no-fault" divorce, or dissolution of marriage, the husband no longer needs to plead or prove specific grounds; his dissatisfaction is thus acceptable as sufficient cause for dissolving the marriage.

This figure is derived from data provided in the Kinsey Report, SEXUAL BEHAVIOR IN THE HUMAN MALE, showing average marital coitus taking place with a frequency of 2.6 times per week when the male is age 20, and 1.3 times per week when the male is forty-five. As the figures show a straight line decline, the average weekly frequency rate is 1.95. Thus, 1.95 times per week × 52 weeks per year × 25 fertile years = 2,535 acts of coitus per married woman's fertile lifetime. Kinsey, Pomeroy, and Martin, SEXUAL BEHAVIOR IN THE HUMAN MALE, at 255, data from Fig. 49 (1948).

Under present law, a married woman has two choices: she can attempt to refuse to fulfill the sexual obligations of the marriage and thus risk termination of her marriage; or she can participate in normal marital relations and risk unwanted pregnancy and childbirth. With a choice of either alternative, she risks the consequence of a legally imposed penalty. The woman is left with no non-punishable course of action.

3. THE THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT INCLUDES PROTECTION AGAINST INVOLUNTARY PREGNANCY AND CHILDBEARING.

The women who bear children and the medical experts who assist them testify that pregnancy and childbearing are indeed labor. The fact that many women enter into such labor voluntarily and joyfully does not alter the fact that other women, under other circumstances, find childbearing too arduous, become pregnant through no choice of their own, and are then forced to complete the pregnancy to term by compulsion of state laws prohibiting voluntary abortion.

It is the purpose of the Thirteenth Amendment to prohibit a relationship in which one person or entity limits the freedom of another person. In the absence of a compelling state interest or due conviction for a crime, the state's forcing the pregnant woman through unwanted pregnancy to full term is a denial of her Thirteenth Amendment right to be free from "a condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another." (Hodges v. United States, supra). This is the very essence of involuntary servitude in which the personal service of one person is "disposed of or coerced for another's benefit." (Bailey v. Alabama, supra.)

II. THERE IS NO COMPELLING STATE INTEREST TO JUSTIFY IMPAIRMENT OF THE PREGNANT WOMAN'S FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO BE FREE FROM INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE.

A. The Necessity of Showing a Compelling State Interest.

The Thirteenth Amendment guarantees to every person those fundamental rights which are "the essence of civil freedom." Jones v. Mayer, supra; The Civil Rights Cases, supra. In Union Pacific Railway Company v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250, 251 (1891), this Court recognized:

> No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded, by the common law, than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraint or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law.

It is clear that in order to justify the regulation of fundamental private rights, the state must show a compelling need. "Where there is significant encroachment upon personal liberty, the State may prevail only upon showing a subordinating interest which is compelling." Bates v. City of Little Rock, 361 U.S. 516, 524 (1960).

The critical issue is whether the state's regulation is "necessary . . . to the accomplishment of a permissible state policy." (McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 196 [1964]; NAACP v. Button, 371 U.S. 415, 438 [1963]; Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398, 403 [1963]), and whether legislation impinging on constitutionally protected areas is narrowly drawn and not of "unlimited and indiscriminate sweep." Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 490 (1960). See also Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 308 (1940); McCann v. Babbitz, 310 F. Supp. 293 (E.D. Wis. 1970), (per curiam) appeal dismissed, 400 U.S. 1 (1970) (per curiam).

B. The Nature of State Interest in Areas of Exception Permitting the Imposition of Involuntary Service.

The law has recognized certain exceptions to the Thirteenth Amendment, all such exceptions being based on the state's compelling interest in serving the common need. Thus, although the Thirteenth Amendment proscribes a "condition of enforced compulsory service of one to another" (Hodges v. United States, supra), services required by the state for the benefit and protection of all citizens do not fall within the meaning of involuntary servitude under the Thirteenth Amendment. Avins, Freedom of Choice in Personal Service Occupations: Thirteenth Amendment Limitations on Antidiscrimination Legislation, 49 CORNELL L.Q. 228, 240 (1964).

1. MILITARY SERVICE.

Compulsory military service is not regarded as involuntary servitude, because the draftee's surrender of personal freedom and safety are made in the interests of national defense, a common need. Arver v. United States (Selective Draft Law Cases), 245 U.S. 366 (1918); United States v. Lumsden, 449 F.2d 154 (9th Cir. 1971). Nor is the Thirteenth Amendment regarded as violated by assignment of conscientious objectors to work camps or other work assignments as an alternative to military service; again, a common need is served. Kramer v. United States, 147 F.2d 756 (6th Cir. 1945), cert. den. 324 U.S. 878; Reese v. United States, 225 F.2d 766 (9th Cir. 1955); United States v. Rogers, 454 F.2d 601 (7th Cir. 1971). However, the draftee is pressed into service only if his physical condition permits such service (Selective Service Act of 1967, 50 U.S.C.A. app. Sec. 454 [a]); he is paid for his services (Id. Sec. 454 [e]); and is further reimbursed by way of veterans' benefits (38 U.S.C. Sec. 101, et seq.).

2. INVOLUNTARY COMMITMENT OR HOSPITALIZATION.

The compulsory commitment of mentally ill individuals who may be harmful to themselves or to society if allowed to remain at large does not violate the Thirteenth Amendment, but only if the commitment procedures contain sufficient procedural safeguards and if the activities required of the individuals are for therapeutic purposes. Jobson v. Henne, 355 F.2d 129 (1966). However, if the mental institution requires inmates to perform chores which have no therapeutic purpose or relationship to the inmate's personal needs, the Thirteenth Amendment is violated. Ibid. See also Taylor v. Georgia, 315 U.S. 25 (1942) and Note, District of Columbia Hospitalization of the Mentally Ill, 65 COLUM. L. REV. 1062, 1066-72 (1965).

3. JURY DUTY.

Jury duty does not constitute involuntary servitude; such service rendering effective the government under which liberty of the citizen may be protected. Crews v. Lundquist, 361 Ill. 193, 197 N.E. 768 (1935). But the citizen called for jury duty is excused if personal duties override.

4. PAYMENT AND REPORTING OF TAXES.

Payment and reporting of taxes is not regarded as involuntary servitude because the service is for support of the general welfare and not for another individual. Beltran v. Cohen, 303 F. Supp. 889 (N.D. Cal. 1969).

C. The Nature of State Interest in the Abortion Conflict.

The state's restriction or regulation of abortion as a special procedure imposes limitation on the pregnant woman's control of her person and her services. What compelling state interest justifies such impairment of her personal rights? A number of possible reasons have been stated:

1. THE STATE'S INTEREST IN RIGHTS OF THE FETUS.[23]

An argument recently raised is that the state has a compelling interest in protecting the rights of the fetus. This is the legal position taken by those who argue that conception is a dramatic moment in the evolution of a human being, after which the fetus becomes a "person" within the terms of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and is so entitled to the constitutional protections afforded any other citizen.

Such argument disregards the nature of the state's interest in the fetus in all contexts other than the modern abortion conflict: First: The rights of citizenship conferred by the Fourteenth Amendment relate to "all persons born or naturalized . . ." (emphasis added). There are no cases holding that fetuses are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. Second: Of all the statutes and rules referred to by proponents of the "right to life" argument, none confers rights on the fetus in utero; all such rights exist only in contemplation of live birth or reflect interests of the parents.[24] Third: The state does not generally regard as punishable the destruction of the fetus by any person other than the doctor or abortionist. See Keeler v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 3d 619, 470 P.2d 617, 87 Cal. Rptr. 481 (1970), in which the California Supreme Court held that the assailant of a pregnant woman could not be guilty of murder although a Caesarean section and examination in utero revealed that the fetus, of approximately thirty-five weeks, had died of a severely fractured skull and resultant hemorrhaging. The same result would apply in Texas under 2A Tex. Pen. Code, art. 1202 (1961) and in Georgia under Ga. Code Ann., Sec. 26-1103.

23. Amici will, in this section, use the term "fetus" when referring to the contents of the uterus although the term is medically incorrect. Medically, the term "embryo" refers to the organism from conception through the first three months of gestation; the term "fetus" refers to the organism from the end of the first three pre-natal months until birth; the term "conceptus" covers in utero being through all stages of pregnancy. Amici use "fetus" here, a more familiar legal term.

Some courts and commentators have already analyzed and rejected the idea that the state has any compelling interest in protecting the rights of the fetus. See California v. Belous, supra; McCann v. Babbitz, supra; Sands, Therapeutic Abortion Act: An Answer to the Opposition, 13 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 285, 305 (1966); Ziff, Recent Abortion Law Reforms, 60 J. Crim. L. C. & P.S. 3 (1969).

Nevertheless, even if the position were accepted, arguendo, that the fetus is a "person" or "potential person,"

24. See e.g. In re Wells' Will, 221 N. Y. Supp. 714 (1927), and Carroll v. Skloff, 415 Pa. 47, 202 A.2d 9 (1964), (ownership of property wholly dependent on live birth); Atkinson, Wills, 75 (2d ed. 1953); Prosser, Torts, 356 (3d ed. 1964), (an individual may sue for pre-natal injuries "provided he is born alive"); California v. Belous, 71 Cal. 2d 954, 968, 458 P.2d 194, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354 (1969), cert. den. 397 U.S. 915 (1970), ("All of the statutes and rules relied upon [to support the right to life] require a live birth or reflect the interest of the parents.").

such recognition of the fetus would not provide the state with a compelling interest to justify encroachment upon the pregnant woman's possession and free control of her own person.

Let us assume, for the time being, that the pregnant woman and the fetus she carries within her body have come before the law as equal "persons." The woman desires an abortion. May the state legitimately intervene to prevent the abortion? At the present stage of medical knowledge and ability to control human incubation, the fetus cannot survive and develop into a separate self-sustaining person without contribution of the bodily force of the single female individual who carries that particular fetus within her body. Yet the laws prohibiting and regulating abortion, unlike all other laws in respect of persons, compel this pregnant woman to breathe, process food and donate blood for the sustenance of another human entity, either fully or partially developed. In no other instance does the law compel one individual to donate his/her bodily force to another individual. In no other instance does the law give another human — even a fully developed human — a right to life beyond that which the person himself can sustain.

The law does not give a person in need of blood the right to receive blood from an unwilling donor; the conclusiveness of the law on this subject being so clearly recognized that it is difficult even to imagine testing such a principle in the courts.[25]

25. Notwithstanding the close relationship of parent and living child, there is no legal duty of the parent to contribute blood from his/her body for the donation to the living child. Even the parent of a live hemophiliac child is not required to donate his/her blood —the principle element for keeping the child alive. Nor are parents of living children required to draw any substance from their own bodies for contribution to their children. Mothers are not compelled to breast-feed their babies although medical data indicate that breast-fed babies are healthier.

The law does not give a person whose kidneys or other body parts are not functioning the right to demand another person's kidneys or body parts. The Uniform Anatomical Gifts Act, now enacted in forty-four states, recognizes that bodily parts are contributed only by the voluntary act of the donor; and the very titles of the statutes known as anatomical "gift" acts imply that lawmakers have never had any intention of authorizing forcible contributions of bodily parts from one human being to another. Rather than protecting the interests of potential donees in such cases, the state zealously safeguards the rights of potential organ donors. Legislators, courts and commentators, recognizing that there is no obligation, either legally or morally, for one person to supply another, even a close relative who may be dying, with a healthy organ, turn their attention to the issue of informed consent of the potential donor to make sure that he is acting free from any psychological coercion. See Bonner v. Moran, 126 F.2d 121 (D.C. Cir. 1941); Curran, A Problem of Consent: Kidney Transplantation, 34 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 891 (1959); Richards, Medical-Legal Problems of Organ Transplantation, 21 Hastings L. J. 77 (1969); Sanders and Dukeminier, Medical Advance and Legal Lag: Hemodialysis and Kidney Transplantation, 15 U.C.L.A. L. Rev. 357 (1968)[26]

26. Sanders and Dukeminier note that the law permits kidney donation only from adult persons fully informed of the risks and consequences; that the use of prisoners as organ donors has been discontinued on the grounds of possible abuse; that kidney transplantations from living donors are illegal in France because of the fear of moral or psychological coercion. The authors state that donors with only one remaining kidney run the risk of shortening their lives should they be afflicted with kidney disease; and conclude by questioning the propriety of allowing any donor to take such risk. Where the life of the kidney donor may be placed in jeopardy by his donation, or where the consent of a minor is involved, courts use extreme care to be sure that knowing and voluntary consent precedes the donation. See Bonner v. Moran, supra.

As a general rule the law has traditionally been reluctant to impose liability on a person who has failed to rescue or aid one in peril as such liability would be an unwarranted limitation on personal freedom. The Failure to Rescue: A Comparative Study, 52 COLUMBIA L. REV. 631, 632 (1952). A person is not required to jeopardize his own safety to rescue another placed in danger by emergency circumstances. London v. Atlanta Transit Company (1955) 91 Ga. App. 753, 87 S. E. 2d 103, 106. This rule has a long history in case law,[27] and has been reaffirmed in the Restatement of the Law of Torts (Second) Section 314 (1965): "The fact that the actor realizes or should realize that action on his part is necessary for another's aid or protection does not of itself impose upon him the duty to take such action." And Comment C of the Reporter's Notes states:

> The rule stated in this Section is applicable irrespective of the gravity of the danger to which the other is subjected and the insignificance of the trouble, effort, or expense of giving him aid or protection.

While it may be argued that the continuation of pregnancy is a non-active course, and so lacking in comparison with cases relating to "no duty to act," experts recognize that, once conception has taken place, there is no non-active course open to the pregnant woman. To abort takes action; to sustain the fetus also takes action. Even if the life support services which the woman's body brings into performance for sustenance of the fetus are largely automatic and non-voluntary, they are not non-services or non-actions. They are, according to medical experts, arduous, tiring and obstructive of other work. The contractions of childbirth

Eddingfield,* 156 Ind. 416, 59 N.E. 1058 (1901); Gilbert v. Gwin-McCollum Funeral Home, 268 Ala. 372, 106 So. 2d 646 (1958); *O'Keefe v. W. J. are literally "labor." They are the most strenuous work of which the human body is capable.

According to Robert A. Wilson, M.D., obstetrician and gynecologist: "The pressure exerted in this act of birth is at least 80 pounds per square inch, a truly astonishing feat of sheer muscular strength."[28]

Abortion laws alone compel the contribution of one individual's organs, blood, breath and life support system for another individual, either fully or partially formed. Unless the law recognizes fetuses as more valuable to the state or more worthy of the state's intervention than other potential donees of bodily organs or unless the state finds the freedom and bodily integrity of pregnant women to be less valuable than that of other potential donors, the state must be assumed to maintain in the abortion conflict at least the same position as it does in any similar conflict between two living persons. That is, whenever one person requires an organ donation, or a pint of blood, or even the temporary use of the other person's lung power for artificial respiration, the potential donor's right to refuse is not measured by the degree of interest the state may take in the life of the potential recipient. Rather, it is measured against the potential donor's right in his/her own bodily integrity.

If the pregnant woman, as potential donor, and the fetus, as potential donee, come before the law as equal "persons," one may not command involuntary servitude of the other; and so the potential donor retains her sovereignty over her body and her right to refuse. Therefore, it follows that the fetus, a potential person, can have no greater right over a potential donor. Unless the state has some other compelling interest in forcing the donation of the pregnant woman's body to the service of the fetus, the state must stand aside in the abortion conflict; it cannot legitimately intervene in preventing the pregnant woman from withholding her life force from the fetus.

2. THE STATE'S INTEREST IN PROTECTING THE HEALTH AND WELFARE OF THE PREGNANT WOMAN.

Strict control by the state of all surgical procedures, not just abortion, is justifiable in the interests of the health of the persons involved. But state control of abortion otherwise available through modern medical science actually inhibits the health of the mother, and frustrates the very interest the state would protect.

When abortion laws were first adopted in this country, surgery was very dangerous. Aseptic procedures and antibiotics were unknown. Nearly 40 per cent of patients undergoing surgery of all kinds in the early 19th century died. See, e.g., Ober, Analysis of Surgical Practice at the New York Hospital, 1808-33 (1970); California v. Belous, supra, at 965.

Today, however, it is literally safer for a woman to have an abortion in early pregnancy than to go through childbirth. See California v. Belous, supra, at 965. The maternal mortality rate for therapeutic abortion is three per 100,000; the maternal mortality rate connected with pregnancy and childbirth is 20 per 100,000. Tietze, Mortality with Contraception and Induced Abortion, 45 STUDIES IN FAMILY PLANNING 6 (1969).

On the other hand, women who cannot obtain therapeutic abortions because of the law are driven to criminal abortionists where mortality and morbidity rates are astronomical. See, e.g., Moritz and Thompson, Septic Abortion, 95 AM. J. OBST. & GYNEC. 46 (1966); Reid, Assessment and Management of the Seriously Ill Patient Following Abor- tion, 199 J.A.M.A. 805 (1967). Today, abortion restrictions designed "to protect women from serious risks to life and health in modern times become a scourge." California v. Belous, supra, at 967.

Any justification for abortion laws based on protecting the woman's health has long since been rendered obsolete by medical science, and no compelling state interest in this justification can possibly remain.

3. THE STATE'S INTEREST IN PROMOTING POPULATION GROWTH.

Abortion was not a crime at common law unless induced after the fetus had "quickened," i.e., moved in the womb. Perkins, Criminal Law (1957) 101. Abortion prior to quickening was outlawed and punished as crime in France, England and the United States at the time when those countries required manpower for armies, settling or colonization, with the harshest anti-abortion laws existing in societies with an overriding interest in producing soldiers for military conquest. See Leavy and Kummer, Criminal Abortion: Human Hardship and Unyielding Laws, 35 So. Cal. L. Rev. 123 (1962); Means, The Law of New York Concerning Abortion and the Status of the Fetus, 1664-1968: A Case Study of Cessation of Constitutionality, 14 N.Y.L.F. 411 (1968).

In the early history of our country's colonization and settlement, there was a felt need for more persons. Consequently, population growth was encouraged by anti-abortion law, and importation of slaves was allowed.

Unfortunately, our abortion law is dangerously out of date. Many of our laws and customs still reflect the desires of a nation seeking to fill a frontier. These laws, sensible enough at earlier stages of history when man's survival may have depended on encouraging population maintenance and growth, have become foolish and dangerous in the light of changed circumstances.

A state cannot seriously contend today that restrictions on abortion are justified by an overriding state interest in increasing population. See Ehrlich, The Population Bomb, 1968. On the contrary, it is accepted government policy to limit family size and to encourage family planning. Such state interest is expressed in Population and the American Future, The Report of the President's Commission on Population Growth and the Future (March, 1972) p. 192:

> Recognizing that our population cannot grow indefinitely, and appreciating the advantage of moving now toward the stabilization of population, the Commission recommends that the nation welcome and plan for a stabilized population.

The President's Commission recognizes the acceptability of voluntary abortion as a method of achieving population stability. (Id. at pp. 173-174, 177-178).

4. THE STATE'S INTEREST IN PUNISHING SEXUAL CONDUCT AND PROMOTING "PUBLIC MORALITY."

It is often argued that restrictions on abortion discourage sexual promiscuity by deterring pre-marital and extra-marital sex, and thus enhance "public morality." Such arguments must be reviewed in historical perspective.

The Nineteenth Century morality, in which anti-abortion and anti-contraceptive laws first flourished in this country, regarded sex and sexual information as "sinful." The Comstock Act[29], which prohibited dissemination of obscene materials, did not differentiate between medical or technical studies of sexual activity, contraception, abortion, marriage manuals or hard core pornography. The public was to be shielded from all such sexual information.

29. The Comstock Act, Stat. § 3893, 42nd Congress, Ch. 3 (1883): "Whoever . . . shall sell, lend, or give away . . . or shall have in his possession . . . any obscene book, pamphlet, writing, advertisement, circular, print, picture, drawing or other representative figure . . . or any drug or medicine, or any article whatever, for the prevention of conception, or for causing unlawful abortion, or shall advertise the same for sale . . . or shall manufacture, draw or print . . . any of such articles shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor . . ."

The first case brought under the Comstock Act found a book dealing with sex in marriage to be obscene.[30] A New York statute[31] patterned after the Comstock Act served as the basis for conviction of Margaret Sanger when she opened the first birth control clinic in New York and attempted instruction of women regarding their reproductive systems.[32]

In the modern context, such archaic laws have been abridged by judicial decision and legislation recognizing needs for population control, public health and rights of individuals. (See Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 [1965] and Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 430 [March 22, 1972].)

There is no evidence that a prohibition on abortion deters "immoral conduct" or even non-marital sex. This Court recently rejected a similar argument in invalidating a Massachusetts statute that prohibited sale of contraceptives to unmarried persons. Eisenstadt v. Baird, supra.

> [W]e cannot agree that the deterrence of pre-marital sex may reasonably be regarded as the purpose of the Massachusetts law. . . . It would be plainly unreasonable to assume that Massachusetts has prescribed pregnancy and the birth of an unwanted child as punishment for fornication . . . (Id. at 440.)

In Eisenstadt v. Baird, this Court found that a prohibition on dissemination of contraceptives without limitation to specifically criminal conduct swept too broadly. We submit that a prohibition on abortion without limitation to specifically criminal conduct (e.g., fornication, adultery, prostitution) sweeps too broadly, prohibiting abortion for unwanted pregnancy occurring in marriage, or without criminal sexual conduct, as well as that resulting from an unlawful relationship. A statute cannot withstand the challenge of invasion of constitutional rights if it has such overbreadth that it forbids legitimate acts as well as illegitimate ones. Eisenstadt v. Baird, supra; N.A.A.C.P. v. Alabama, 377 U.S. 288 (1964); Shelton v. Tucker, supra; Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940).

III. IF THE CULPABILITY OF THE PREGNANT WOMAN IS PRESUMED RATHER THAN PROVED, SHE IS DENIED DUE PROCESS UNDER THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The very language of the Thirteenth Amendment prohibits subjection to involuntary servitude "except as punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted." Yet, the state's subjection of an unwilling woman to the continued pregnancy and childbearing compelled by anti-abortion law is accomplished without defining her substantive crime or providing her with due process in proving her guilt and inflicting her punishment.

It is pointless to argue that the pregnant woman is not the subject of the punishment inflicted upon a doctor/abortionist. Once pregnancy begins, the unwillingly pregnant woman is faced with a governmental mandate that requires her to dedicate her body and her strength to a fetus or, in the alternative, to seek out an illegal abortionist in unhealthful surroundings and thereby risk her health and life. The state, by withholding from the pregnant woman the assistance of competent surgical and medical care for legal abortion, effectively condemns the woman to the alternative courses of the continued servitude of pregnancy or the dangers of risking her life and health.

What is the woman's crime? Substantive due process requires that it be clearly defined, not vague, not arbitrary. Is her crime that of having engaged in a sexual relationship? If the relationship occurred within marriage, no crime is involved in any state. On the contrary, the woman was compelled by virtue of her married state to submit to her husband. (See Subsection I.B. 2.b. supra.) Even if the pregnancy may have occurred as the result of some prohibited non-marital sexual conduct (according to due proof), an anti-abortion law punishing such conduct would be overbroad and beyond the competence of the state. (See Eisenstadt v. Baird, supra.) Is her crime that of failing in knowledge of, access to, or effectiveness of contraceptives? Such crime has not been defined by the state.

Regardless of the possible crime that a state might formulate as the basis for a pregnant woman's fault, procedural due process under the Fourteenth Amendment establishes a presumption of innocence which can be overcome only by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, produced in a courtroom with the safeguards of fair procedure. As this Court stated in Deutch v. United States:

> "One of the rightful boasts of Western civilization is that the [prosecution] has the burden of establishing guilt solely on the basis of evidence produced in court and under circumstances assuring an accused all the safeguards of a fair procedure." Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, 729. Among these is the presumption of the defendant's innocence.
> (367 U.S. 456, 471 [1961])

Can due process be totally overlooked in regard to individual rights of unwillingly pregnant women?

It is true that, at varying times in our country's history, rights of some individuals have gone unrecognized while urgently felt public needs pressed for stronger recognition. Thus, during the early years of this country's colonization and settlement, the pressing need for more persons to settle and work the land was allowed to override considerations of individual rights. Slaves were imported to work and the females of society were pressed into repeated reproductive service.

Today, this country's population has moved far beyond its needed growth, and current government policy is to encourage population control. Anti-abortion laws have outlived their purpose if regarded in historical perspective. Rights of the individual pregnant woman can no longer be ignored.

The Thirteenth Amendment's promise of freedom has long provided to male citizens the sovereign control of their own bodies.

In 1942, this Court protected the civil right of a male person, even one duly convicted of crime, to control his own reproductive system. Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535. Is it any the less important that this Court protect the right of a female person to control her body and her reproductive system?

CONCLUSION

We respectfully request this Court to recognize that the anti-abortion laws which force an unwillingly pregnant woman to continue pregnancy to term are a form of involuntary servitude without due conviction for a crime and without the justification of serving any national or public need.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN K. BRADFORD,
Attorney for Amici Curiae.

On Appeal from the United States District Court For the Northern District of Georgia

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The district court, in its decision reported as Mary Doe, et al, v. Arthur K. Bolton, et al, 319 F.Supp. 1048 (N.D. Ga. 1970), supplemental opinion, 319 F.Supp. 1057 (N.D. Ga. 1970), found the Georgia abortion statute infringed a woman's constitutional right of privacy to decide if and when she would bear a child. A declaratory judgment was issued in which the court ruled that the right of privacy included the right to terminate an unwanted pregnancy. The court did not invalidate the procedures for obtaining an abortion and refused to issue an injunction in support of its declaratory judgment. Appellants brought the case here under 28 U.S.C. §1253.

Oral argument was made before this Court on December 13, 1971, and an order for reargument was issued on June 26, 1972.

Appellants reassert each and every argument made in its brief previously filed; this brief is intended only to supplement the prior authorities cited.

SUPPLEMENTAL ARGUMENT

I. THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF PRIVACY INCLUDES THE RIGHT TO TERMINATE AN UNWANTED PREGNANCY.

Appellants have previously urged the correctness of the district court's ruling in this case, i.e., the right of privacy includes the right to terminate an unwanted pregnancy. This Court seems to have adopted that view last term in Eisenstadt v. Baird, ____U.S.____, 92 S.Ct. 1029 (1972). The Court, through Mr. Justice Brennan, said:

> If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child. See Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557(1969). See also Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11,29 (1905). [Emphasis in original.]

Appellants urge that the holding of the Baird case be expressly stated to encompass the right to terminate a pregnancy. Since submission of the prior briefs and oral argument in this case several courts, both federal and state, have ruled abortion statutes unconstitutional on the privacy ground. Appellants will not attempt to list or discuss these cases but refer the Court to the amicus curiae brief filed contemporaneously by Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., and the American Association of Planned Parenthood Physicians. That brief surveys the recent cases and their holdings.

II. THE PROCEDURAL REQUIREMENTS OF THE GEORGIA ABORTION STATUTE UNNECESSARILY BURDEN AND RESTRICT A WOMAN'S CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT OF PRIVACY.

Appellants have asserted that the right of privacy involved is a constitutionally protected fundamental right and that a state's restriction thereof must be demonstrated to be "necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest." Dunn v. Blumstein, ____U.S.____, 92 S.Ct. 995 (1972). In commenting on the above test the Court stated:

> The key words emphasize a matter of degree: that a heavy burden of justification is on the state, and that statute will be closely scrutinized in light of its asserted purposes.

In discussing the durational residence requirements in that case, the Court stated further:

> It is not sufficient for the State to show that durational residence requirements further a very sub> stantial state interest. In pursuing that important interest, the State cannot choose means which unnecessarily burden or restrict constitutionally protected activity. Statutes affecting constitutional rights must be drawn with "precision," . . . and must be "tailored" to serve their legitimate objectives. . . . And if there are other, reasonable ways to achieve those goals with a lesser burden on constitutionally protected activity, a State may not choose the way of greater interference. If it acts at all, it must choose "less drastic means." [Citations omitted.]

Appellant's prior brief was directed at showing that the procedural requirements left standing by the district court (two consultants, approval by an abortion committee, and required accredited hospital facility) unnecessarily burden and restrict the constitutionally protected right. It is recognized that protecting the health of its citizens is a valid state interest, however, appellants contend there are other reasonable ways to achieve this goal with a lesser burden on the constitutionally protected activity. The procedure upheld by the district court is wholly lacking in adequate safeguards required by minimal due process requirements. The statutory hospital abortion committee is the decision maker as to whether a woman will receive an abortion, yet the woman has no right to make any presentation to the committee, to know the reasons on which the committee's decision is based, or to appeal an adverse decision. The procedure lacks fundamental fairness as to all applicants. The time consuming and cumbersome procedures of the statute and its requirement that abortions be performed only in accredited hospitals effectively manipulate plaintiff's rights out of existence.

Two recent cases deal specifically with similar A.L.I. abortion procedural requirements and the Court's attention is drawn to those analyses of similar statutory provisions.

The statute under attack in Vuitch v. Hardy, ____F. Supp. ____ (No. 71-1129-Y) (D.Md. June 22, 1972), like the Georgia statute, was modeled after the American Law Institute Model Penal Code. It required that abortions be performed in licensed, accredited hospitals (Joint Commission for the Accreditation of Hospitals) and the abortion must be approved by a "hospital abortion review authority appointed by the hospital."

The case was decided by a single district judge on a petition for writ of habeas corpus. The defendant had been convicted in a state criminal proceeding for performing a nonaccredited hospital abortion.[1] The position in the district court there was that hospitalization is generally not necessary for performance of abortions in the first trimester of pregnancy, that state-regulated clinics have been found to be safe and easily regulated in other states and that many Maryland women have been induced to seek abortions in other states because of costs and scheduling delays caused by the accredited hospital requirement.[2]

[1]This decision does not rule on the hospital abortion committee requirement.

[2]It is interesting to note that only two hospitals in Maryland which provide obstetrical and gynecological services were not accredited, while in Georgia approximately 140 hospitals furnishing similar services are not accredited but are licensed. In 1971 Georgia women received 1,579 abortions in Georgia hospitals. For the same year 3,410 Georgia women travelled to New York for abortion services. See C. Tyler, L. Baker, J. Bourne, G. Burger, Center for Disease Control Abortion Surveillance Report for 1971 (U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Public Health Service).

It was observed that abortion is a surgical procedure which affects the patient's health, however, the court found that "reasonable alternatives have been shown to exist which would entail less of a burden on the exercise of constitutional rights."

The Court found as a fact that

> . . . the requirement that abortion be performed only in licensed, accredited hospitals does place some burden on Maryland women's rights to seek an abortion, that that burden would be lightened by permitting abortions to be performed in other facilities as well,[3] and that the experience of other states has proved that, with appropriate regulation, facilities other than hospitals can and do protect the health of the woman seeking an abortion as adequately as hospitals do.[4]

The three-judge district court in Poe v. Menghini, 339 F.Supp. 986(D.Kan. 1972) also invalidated a JCAH accreditation requirement in the Kansas statute (also patterned after the A.L.I. model penal code). There 80 of 169 Kansas hospitals were not accredited, the court stated:

> So substantial a limitation of facilities constitutes a significant encroachment upon the exercise of a fundamental right.

[3]Several alternatives were discussed by the court, e.g., use of specialized abortion facilities subject to state licensing and regulatory procedures. It was correctly observed, appellants think, that such facilities might be more susceptible to regulation than hospitals since the regulatory authorities might be hesitant to revoke a hospital's license especially where it was the only health care facility for an area.

[4]See brief of Planned Parenthood filed contemporaneously herewith for discussion of the New York clinical experience.

In discussing whether the state's interest was served by the JCAH requirement, the court made several pertinent observations: First, JCAH has never been concerned with the content of medical practice, rather, its standards are addressed to the physical plant, the organization of the hospital, equipment, etc. Thus, JCAH may help insure adequate personnel and facilities, but it has no bearing on the hospital's abortion policy or the decision making process. Second, the provision classifies abortion services apart from other medical procedures. Because the state interest could be fully protected by a less restrictive requirement, the Court found the accreditation requirement unconstitutional.

An additional infirmity in the accreditation requirement was found by the Kansas court because there the State of Kansas like the State of Georgia[5] purported to delegate authority to adopt standards for abortion services to the Joint Commission. This delegation was found to violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Appellants here urge this Court to rule that the Georgia hospital accreditation requirement, like that of Maryland and Kansas, places an unnecessary burden and restriction on the exercise of fundamental constitutional right. Since there are reasonable, less restrictive alternatives sufficient to protect the state's interest, the state has not met its "heavy burden of justification" and the accreditation requirement must be invalidated.

The Kansas statute did not have an abortion committee provision, however, the Court did invalidate the requirement that three physicians certify the necessity of an abortion. Since the certifications were merely by other physicians (possibly a dermatologist or a podiatrist) rather than being limited to a specialty, e.g., psychiatrists when mental health reasons were given, such (certifications) served no health interest. The Court apparently felt that the state's interest was served by preserving the traditional patient-physician relationship and placed reliance on the self-discipline and professional ethics of the medical profession.

With respect to the physician's right to practice their profession and exercise their professional discretion, the Court ruled that the required consultants provision subordinated the woman's attending physician's judgment to that of the other two physicians. Such a requirement unconstitutionally curtailed the availability of abortions and "the physician's right to administer to his patient in accordance with his best judgment." This reasoning is applicable to the Georgia consultants requirement and, of course, when applied to the hospital abortion committee requirement requires a similar result.

CONCLUSION

The judgment of the district court should be reversed insofar as it found no justiciable controversy in the claim of appellant physicians, nurses, social workers, ministers, and family planning and abortion counselling organizations, and the opinion of this Court should expressly declare invalid the Georgia abortion statute and direct the district court to enjoin the future enforcement thereof with respect to abortions performed by physicians duly licensed to practice medicine by Georgia law.

INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE

The amici in this brief are the attorneys general of five states in which the statutes governing the performance of abortions are similar to the statute of the State of Texas; and which statutes have also been challenged before three-judge federal courts on constitutional grounds. It is the considered opinion of these amici, for reasons more fully explored in this brief, that this matter should be remanded to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, affirming the denial of injunctive relief and vacating the declaratory judgment as to the constitutionality of the Texas abortion statute.

BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE OF THE ATTORNEYS GENERAL OF ARIZONA, CONNECTICUT, KENTUCKY, NEBRASKA AND UTAH

QUESTION PRESENTED

This case raises an issue of jurisdiction. The jurisdictional question is whether the three-judge federal panel below ought to have refrained from granting declaratory relief in this matter.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The three-judge federal court below ought to have refrained from granting declaratory relief in this case.

ARGUMENT

DECLARATORY RELIEF WAS IMPROPERLY GRANTED IN THIS MATTER

In this case, the original request for the convention of a three-judge federal court was based on the allegation that certain rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States were infringed upon by the existence of a state statute proscribing the performance of abortions except in certain limited situations. It is submitted that such an allegation, per se, deserves careful scrutiny.

In the first place, none of the original plaintiffs had been threatened with criminal prosecution under the challenged statute, no harassment had occurred, and the possibility of prosecution had never even been intimated. It is one thing to call upon the federal judiciary when enforcement of a state statute is alleged to interfere with one's alleged constitutionally-protected rights; it is quite another to turn to the federal judiciary with the complaint that the mere existence of a state statute interferes with such alleged rights. To call upon the federal judiciary in the latter situation is to seek an advisory opinion.

In the second place, this Court need not be reminded that the mere allegation of interference with one's federal rights does not, of itself, warrant the entrance of the federal judiciary into the arena. This Court has limited the interference of the federal courts to certain specific areas. It is respectfully submitted that the court below ought to have refrained from exercising jurisdiction and, further, that the authority for the entrance of that court into this matter was–and remains–non-existent. For these reasons, these amici urge that the case should be remanded to the court below with an order vacating the declaratory judgment which it originally granted.

The doctrine of federal abstention was perhaps most precisely enunciated by Mr. Justice Frankfurter in his careful opinion in Railroad Commission v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496 (1941). In that case, speaking of three-judge federal panels, he said that: "(F)ew public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies. . . ." (at 500). When discussing the possible "friction with state policies" in the area of criminal law, Justice Frankfurter cited Fenner v. Boykin, 271 U.S. 240 (1926) and Spielman Motor Co. v. Dodge, 295 U.S. 89 (1935). He noted that these and other cases, > "... reflect a doctrine of abstention appropriate to our federal system whereby the federal courts 'exercising a wise discretion' restrain their authority because of 'a scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of the state governments' and for the smooth working of the federal judiciary." 312 U.S. at 501.

Fenner v. Boykin, supra, involved a challenge to the constitutionality of a Georgia statute which proscribed various dealings in certain commodities and also proscribed the maintenance of an office where such transactions could be facilitated. Appellants, citizens of another state (which, it is submitted, is of no consequence herein) established such an office and were threatened with arrest and prosecution. They challenged the validity of the Georgia statute upon the ground that it interfered with the free flow of commerce among the States and was thus violative of the federal constitution. This Court affirmed the dismissal below with the observation that Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908) and other cases,

> "... have established the doctrine that when absolutely necessary for protection of constitutional rights, courts of the United States have power to enjoin state officers from instituting criminal actions. But this may not be done except under extraordinary circumstances where the danger of irreparable loss is both great and immediate. Ordinarily, there should be no interference with such officers; primarily, they are charged with the duty of prosecuting offenders against the laws of the State and must decide when and how this is to be done." 271 U.S. at 243-244.

This Court made the further observation, which is especially telling herein:

> "The accused should first set up and rely upon his defense in the state courts, even though this involves a challenge of the validity of some statute, unless it plainly appears that this course would not afford adequate protection. The Judicial Code provides ample opportunity for ultimate review here in respect of > federal questions. An intolerable condition would arise if, whenever about to be charged with violating a state law, one were permitted freely to contest its validity by an original proceeding in some federal court." Ibid. at 244.

Amici submit that this last-quoted portion of the decision is worthy of emphasis. To say that the condition would be "intolerable" is to engage in understatement if, even without the least intimation of a possible prosecution and even without the violation necessary to a prosecution, individuals are to be allowed to contest selected portions of the criminal codes of the various States in original Federal court proceedings.

The other case cited by Mr. Justice Frankfurter when discussing the possibility of "friction with State policies" in the area of criminal law is Spielman Motor Co. v. Dodge, supra. That case involved a challenge, before a three-judge federal panel, to a New York statute which sanctioned criminal penalties for its violation. The challenge was based on the contention that the statute in question violated the New York Constitution as being an "improper delegation of legislative power" and the Constitution of the United States as "effectuating a deprivation of liberty and property without due process of law. . . ." Therein, Mr. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the Court, held that the conditions which would allow the proper interference of a three-judge federal panel in the administration of a State's criminal code, were as follows:

> "We have said that it must appear that 'the danger of irreparable loss is both great and immediate;' otherwise, the accused should first set up his defense in the State court, even though the validity of a Statute is challenged. There is ample opportunity for ultimate review by this Court of federal questions." 295 U.S. at 95-96, citing Fenner v. Boykin, supra, at 242-244.

Douglas v. City of Jeannette, 319 U.S. 157 (1943), involved the convention of a three-judge federal court in which certain members of a religious sect sought to restrain the enforcement of a municipal ordinance on the ground that, as applied to them, it abridged "the guarantees of freedom of speech, press and religion of the First Amendment made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth" (at 159). Jurisdiction therein was alleged to rest on the Constitution and laws of the United States, including the Civil Rights Act of 1871. The right of federal district courts to jurisdiction in actions brought under the Civil Rights Act had previously been established. Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939). However, Chief Justice Stone, speaking for the Court in Jeannette, noted that in spite of the authority of the federal district court--and in spite, also, of the certain unconstitutionality of the ordinance–the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief they sought "only if they establish a cause of action in equity," 319 U.S. at 162. He further stated that:

> "It is a familiar rule that courts of equity do not ordinarily restrain criminal prosecutions. No person is immune from prosecution in good faith for his alleged criminal acts." Ibid.

The Chief Justice observed that imminent prosecution, even under a statute or ordinance allegedly violative of the federal Constitution, did not warrant the interference of the federal courts and said that:

> "Where the threatened prosecution is by State officers for alleged violations of a state law, the state courts are the final arbiters of its meaning and application, subject only to review by this Court on federal grounds appropriately asserted. Hence the arrest by the federal courts of the processes of the criminal law within the states, and the determination of questions of criminal liability under state law by a federal court of equity, are to be supported only on a showing of danger of irreparable injury 'both great and immediate' (citing cases)," 319 U.S. at 163-164.

Amici acknowledge the propriety and, often, the necessity of federal court intervention when prosecution, or threatened prosecution, show an immediate danger of irreparable damage to the accused. However, the decisions of this Court, in our reading of them, establish that where prosecution or the threat of prosecution is absent then, a fortiori, the danger of irreparable damage is absent and the intervention of the federal judiciary is unwarranted in such a situation in the administration of state criminal laws.

In Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965), the convention of the three-judge panel below had been based on the allegation that certain Louisiana statutes were violative of the First and Fourteenth Amendment guarantees securing freedom of expression; and also that the officers charged with enforcement of these laws had engaged in the bad faith harassment of the plaintiffs.

In that case Mr. Justice Brennan, speaking for the Court, noted that:

> "In Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, the fountainhead of federal injunctions against state prosecutions, the Court characterized the power and its proper exercise in broad terms: it would be justified where state officers '. . .threaten and are about to commence proceedings, either of a civil or criminal nature, to enforce against parties affected an unconstitutional act violating the Federal Constitution. . . .' 209 U.S. at 156. Since that decision, however, considerations of federalism have tempered the exercise of equitable power for the Court has recognized that federal interference with a State's good-faith administration of its criminal laws is peculiarly inconsistent with our federal framework." 380 U.S. at 483-484.

Mr. Justice Brennan, citing Douglas v. City of Jeannette, supra, at 164, further observed that the abstention of federal equity courts is warranted where the defendant is not " 'threatened with any injury other than that incidental to every criminal proceeding brought lawfully and in good faith,' " Ibid. at 485.

The decision in Dombrowski did, of course, narrow the grounds for federal abstention. In that case, however, this Court based this limitation upon the facts that the prosecution–or threatened prosecution–would constitute an undue interference with First and Fourteenth Amendment rights guaranteeing freedom of expression; and also on the fact that the record presented a sorry display of harassment on the part of the State officers. The decision in Dombrowski is readily distinguishable from the case at bar. The main thrust of the the challenge to the Texas abortion statute below was in no real way related to the freedom of expression; and no harassment, prosecution or threat of prosecution was alleged. What was alleged was a fear of prosecution should the plaintiffs below engage in actions violative of the Texas criminal law. No where, in the cases decided by this Court, can justification be found for the interference of federal courts of equity in such a situation.

In a recent series of cases, Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971), Boyle v. Landry, 401 U.S. 77 (1971),Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U.S. 66 (1971), and companion cases, this Court discussed in great detail the grounds for interference by the federal judiciary in the administration of state criminal laws. The actual facts in Younger are, of course, different from those in the case at bar in that injunctive relief was sought from a three-judge federal court after the plaintiff therein had been indicted in a state criminal proceeding. This Court held that the grant of such injunctive relief was improper. What is most applicable to the instant case challenging the Texas abortion statute, however, is that Harris–in his suit seeking federal injunctive relief–was joined by three other individuals. Two of these, "Jim Dan and Diane Hirsch intervened as plaintiffs in the suit, claiming that the prosecution of Harris would inhibit them as members of the Progressive Labor Party, from peacefully advocating the program of their party. . . ." Younger v. Harris, supra, at 39. A third individual, "Farrell Broslawsky, an instructor in history at the Los Angeles Valley College, also intervened claiming that the prosecution of Harris made him uncertain as to whether he could teach about the doctrines of Karl Marx or read from the Communist Manifesto as part of his classwork." Ibid. at 39-40. As to these three individuals Mr. Justice Black, in speaking for this Court, said:

> "Whatever right Harris, who is being prosecuted under the state syndicalism law may have, Dan, Hirsch and Broslawsky cannot share it with him. If these three had alleged that they would be prosecuted for the conduct they planned to engage in, and if the District Court had found this allegation to be true–either on the admission of the State's district attorney or on any other evidence–then a genuine controversy might be said to exist. But here appellees Dan, Hirsch and Broslawsky do not claim that they have ever been threatened with prosecution, that a prosecution is likely, or even that a prosecution is remotely possible. They claim the right to bring this suit solely because, in the language of their complaint, they 'feel inhibited.' We do not think that this allegation, even if true, is sufficient to bring the equitable jurisdiction of the federal courts into play to enjoin a pending state prosecution. A federal lawsuit to stop a prosecution in a state court is a serious matter. And persons having no fears of state prosecution except those that are imaginary or speculative, are not to be accepted as appropriate plaintiffs in such cases." Ibid. at 42.

It is submitted that the situation of Intervenor Hallford in the case at bar is similar to that of Harris; while the situation of the original plaintiffs is similar to that of those who joined with Harris in his federal suit. The fact that injunctive relief is sought from a federal court before or after the initiation of criminal proceedings will make little difference if such courts are willing to grant such relief on anything approaching a regular basis. It is submitted that it would subvert the entire thrust of the federal abstention doctrine if individuals, desiring to engage in certain actions which are proscribed by a state criminal statute, are free--even in the absence of any harassment, threat of prosecution or true infringement upon First Amendment guarantees of freedom of expression–to engage the federal courts in an attempt to have every statute which allegedly interferes with their federal rights by its very existence declared unconstitutional.

In speaking of the right of Harris himself to federal injunctive relief, Justice Black noted that it was incorrect to assume that the Dombrowski decision made such relief available "without regard to any showing of bad faith or harrassment, whenever a state statute is found 'on its face' to be vague or overly broad, in violation of the First Amendment." Ibid. at 50. Neither harassment nor bad faith prosecution was ever established in the case at bar; nor would the record permit such a finding.

Boyle v. Landry, supra, involved two sets of plaintiffs in an action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief against the enforcement of certain Illinois statutes and ordinances of the City of Chicago. In obviously speaking of those plaintiffs against whom no criminal prosecutions had been instituted Mr. Justice Black, in speaking for the Court, said:

> "It is obvious that the allegations of the complaint in this case fall far short of showing any irreparable injury from threats or actual prosecutions under the intimidation statute or from any other conduct by state or city officials. Not a single one of the citizens who brought this action had ever been prosecuted, charged or even arrested under the particular intimidation statute which the court below held unconstitutional. All the charges of the complaint deal broadly and generally with all the state statutes and city ordinances that the appellees originally challenged. In fact, the complaint contains no mention of any specific threat by any officer or official of Chicago, Cook Country or the State of Illinois to arrest or prosecute any one or more of the plaintiffs under that statute either one time or many times. . . .the normal course of state criminal prosecutions cannot be disrupted or blocked on the basis of charges which in the last analysis amount to nothing more than speculation about the future." Ibid. at 81.

CONCLUSION

Amici submit that, absent of showing of harassment or bad faith prosecution and absent a showing of true infringement upon the freedom of expression, the grant of anticipatory relief via declaratory judgments or injunctions against state criminal statutes on the allegation that the mere existence of the statute supposedly infringes upon federal constitutional rights, runs counter to the concept of "Our Federalism" discussed by Justice Black in Younger v. Harris, supra, at 44-47. This Court's granting of the right of the plaintiffs below to bring an action such as this could not help but encourage undue interference with the administration of the criminal codes of all the states by the local federal courts.

Therefore, these amici request, that this matter be remanded to the United State District Court for the Northern District of Texas affirming the denial of injunctive relief and vacating the declaratory judgment granted below.

ROE ET AL. v. WADE, DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF DALLAS COUNTY

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

No. 70–18. Argued December 13, 1971—Reargued October 11, 1972—Decided January 22, 1973

A pregnant single woman (Roe) brought a class action challenging the constitutionality of the Texas criminal abortion laws, which proscribe procuring or attempting an abortion except on medical advice for the purpose of saving the mother's life. A licensed physician (Hallford), who had two state abortion prosecutions pending against him, was permitted to intervene. A childless married couple (the Does), the wife not being pregnant, separately attacked the laws, basing alleged injury on the future possibilities of contraceptive failure, pregnancy, unpreparedness for parenthood, and impairment of the wife's health. A three-judge District Court, which consolidated the actions, held that Roe and Hallford, and members of their classes, had standing to sue and presented justiciable controversies. Ruling that declaratory, though not injunctive, relief was warranted, the court declared the abortion statutes void as vague and overbroadly infringing those plaintiffs' Ninth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The court ruled the Does' complaint not justiciable. Appellants directly appealed to this Court on the injunctive rulings, and appellee cross-appealed from the District Court's grant of declaratory relief to Roe and Hallford. Held:

1. While 28 U. S. C. § 1253 authorizes no direct appeal to this Court from the grant or denial of declaratory relief alone, review is not foreclosed when the case is properly before the Court on appeal from specific denial of injunctive relief and the arguments as to both injunctive and declaratory relief are necessarily identical. P. 8.

2. Roe has standing to sue; the Does and Hallford do not. Pp. 9–14.

Syllabus

(a) Contrary to appellee's contention, the natural termination of Roe's pregnancy did not moot her suit. Litigation involving pregnancy, which is "capable of repetition, yet evading review," is an exception to the usual federal rule that an actual controversy must exist at review stages and not simply when the action is initiated. Pp. 9–10.

(b) The District Court correctly refused injunctive, but erred in granting declaratory, relief to Hallford, who alleged no federally protected right not assertable as a defense against the good-faith state prosecutions pending against him. Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U. S. 66.

(c) The Does' complaint, based as it is on contingencies, any one or more of which may not occur, is too speculative to present an actual case or controversy. Pp. 12–14.

3. State criminal abortion laws, like those involved here, that except from criminality only a life-saving procedure on the mother's behalf without regard to the stage of her pregnancy and other interests involved violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which protects against state action the right to privacy, including a woman's qualified right to terminate her pregnancy. Though the State cannot override that right, it has legitimate interests in protecting both the pregnant woman's health and the potentiality of human life, each of which interests grows and reaches a "compelling" point at various stages of the woman's approach to term. Pp. 36–49.

(a) For the stage prior to approximately the end of the first trimester, the abortion decision and its effectuation must be left to the medical judgment of the pregnant woman's attending physician. Pp. 36–47.

(b) For the stage subsequent to approximately the end of the first trimester, the State, in promoting its interest in the health of the mother, may, if it chooses, regulate the abortion procedure in ways that are reasonably related to maternal health. Pp. 43–44.

(c) For the stage subsequent to viability the State, in promoting its interest in the potentiality of human life, may, if it chooses, regulate, and even proscribe, abortion except where necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother. Pp. 44–48.

4. The State may define the term "physician" to mean only a physician currently licensed by the State, and may proscribe any abortion by a person who is not a physician as so defined. Pp. 34–35, 48.

5. It is unnecessary to decide the injunctive relief issue since the Texas authorities will doubtless fully recognize the Court's ruling that the Texas criminal abortion statutes are unconstitutional. P. 51.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 70–18

Jane Roe et al., Appellants,
v.
Henry Wade.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas.

[January 22, 1973]

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

This Texas federal appeal and its Georgia companion, Doe v. Bolton, post ——, present constitutional challenges to state criminal abortion legislation. The Texas statutes under attack here are typical of those that have been in effect in many States for approximately a century. The Georgia statutes, in contrast, have a modern cast and are a legislative product that, to an extent at least, obviously reflects the influences of recent attitudinal change, of advancing medical knowledge and techniques, and of new thinking about an old issue.

We forthwith acknowledge our awareness of the sensitive and emotional nature of the abortion controversy, of the vigorous opposing views, even among physicians, and of the deep and seemingly absolute convictions that the subject inspires. One's philosophy, one's experiences, one's exposure to the raw edges of human existence, one's religious training, one's attitudes toward life and family and their values, and the moral standards one establishes and seeks to observe, are all likely to influence and to color one's thinking and conclusions about abortion.

In addition, population growth, pollution, poverty, and racial overtones tend to complicate and not to simplify the problem.

Our task, of course, is to resolve the issue by constitutional measurement free of emotion and of predilection. We seek earnestly to do this, and, because we do, we have inquired into, and in this opinion place some emphasis upon, medical and medical-legal history and what that history reveals about man's attitudes toward the abortive procedure over the centuries. We bear in mind, too, Mr. Justice Holmes' admonition in his now vindicated dissent in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45, 76 (1905):

> "It [the Constitution] is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and familiar or novel and even shocking ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

I

The Texas statutes that concern us here are Arts. 1191–1194 and 1196 of the State's Penal Code.[1] These

[1] "Article 1191. Abortion

"If any person shall designedly administer to a pregnant woman or knowingly procure to be administered with her consent any drug or medicine, or shall use towards her any violence or means whatever externally or internally applied, and thereby procure an abortion, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than two nor more than five years; if it be done without her consent, the punishment shall be doubled. By 'abortion' is meant that the life of the fetus or embryo shall be destroyed in the woman's womb or that a premature birth thereof be caused.

"Art. 1192. Furnishing the means

"Whoever furnishes the means for procuring an abortion knowing the purpose intended is guilty as an accomplice.

"Art. 1193. Attempt at abortion

"If the means used shall fail to produce an abortion, the offender is nevertheless guilty of an attempt to produce abortion, provided make it a crime to "procure an abortion," as therein defined, or to attempt one, except with respect to "an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." Similar statutes are in existence in a majority of the States.[2] it be shown that such means were calculated to produce that result, and shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars.

"Art. 1194. Murder in producing abortion

"If the death of the mother is occasioned by an abortion so produced or by an attempt to effect the same it is murder.

"Art. 1196. By medical advice

"Nothing in this chapter applies to an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother."

The foregoing Articles, together with Art. 1195, comprise Chapter 9 of Title 15 of the Penal Code. Article 1195, not attacked here, reads:

"Art. 1195. Destroying unborn child

"Whoever shall during parturition of the mother destroy the vitality or life in a child in a state of being born and before actual birth, which child would otherwise have been born alive, shall be confined in the penitentiary for life or for not less than five years."

Texas first enacted a criminal abortion statute in 1854. Texas Laws 1854, c. 49, § 1, set forth in 3 Gammel, Laws of Texas, 1502 (1898). This was soon modified into language that has remained substantially unchanged to the present time. See Texas Penal Code of 1857, Arts. 531–536; Paschal's Laws of Texas, Arts. 2192–2197 (1866); Texas Rev. Stat., Arts. 536–541 (1879); Texas Rev. Crim. Stat., Arts. 1071–1076 (1911). The final article in each of these compilations provided the same exception, as does the present Article 1196, for an abortion by "medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother." [3] Long ago a suggestion was made that the Texas statutes were unconstitutionally vague because of definitional deficiencies. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals disposed of that suggestion peremptorily, saying only,

"It is also insisted in the motion in arrest of judgment that the statute is unconstitutional and void in that it does not sufficiently define or describe the offense of abortion. We do not concur in respect to this question." Jackson v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. R. 79, 89, 115 S. W. 262, 268 (1908).

The same court recently has held again that the State's abortion statutes are not unconstitutionally vague or overbroad. Thompson v. State, — Tex. Crim. App. —, — S. W. 2d — (1971), appeal pending. The court held that "the State of Texas has a compelling interest to protect fetal life"; that Art. 1191 "is designed to protect fetal life"; that the Texas homicide statutes, particularly Art. 1205 of the Penal Code, are intended to protect a person "in existence by actual birth" and thereby implicitly recognize other human life that is not "in existence by actual birth"; that the definition of human life is for the legislature and not the courts; that Art. 1196 "is Jane Roe,[4] a single woman who was residing in Dallas County, Texas, instituted this federal action in March 1970 against the District Attorney of the county. She sought a declaratory judgment that the Texas criminal abortion statutes were unconstitutional on their face, and an injunction restraining the defendant from enforcing the statutes.

Roe alleged that she was unmarried and pregnant; that she wished to terminate her pregnancy by an abortion "performed by a competent, licensed physician, under safe, clinical conditions"; that she was unable to get a "legal" abortion in Texas because her life did not appear to be threatened by the continuation of her pregnancy; and that she could not afford to travel to another jurisdiction in order to secure a legal abortion under safe conditions. She claimed that the Texas statutes were unconstitutionally vague and that they abridged her right of personal privacy, protected by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. By an amendment to her complaint Roe purported to sue "on behalf of herself and all other women" similarly situated.

James Hubert Hallford, a licensed physician, sought and was granted leave to intervene in Roe's action. In more definite that the District of Columbia statute upheld in [United States v.] Vuitch" (402 U. S. 62); and that the Texas statute "is not vague and indefinite or overbroad." A physician's abortion conviction was affirmed.

In n. 2, — Tex. Crim. App., at —, — S. W. 2d, at —, the court observed that any issue as to the burden of proof under the exemption of Art. 1196 "is not before us." But see Veevers v. State, 172 Tex. Crim. App. 162, 168–169, 354 S. W. 2d 161 (1962). Cf. United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62, 69–71 (1971).

his complaint he alleged that he had been arrested previously for violations of the Texas abortion statutes and that two such prosecutions were pending against him. He described conditions of patients who came to him seeking abortions, and he claimed that for many cases he, as a physician, was unable to determine whether they fell within or outside the exception recognized by Article 1196. He alleged that, as a consequence, the statutes were vague and uncertain, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and that they violated his own and his patients' rights to privacy in the doctor-patient relationship and his own right to practice medicine, rights he claimed were guaranteed by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments.

John and Mary Doe,[5] a married couple, filed a companion complaint to that of Roe. They also named the District Attorney as defendant, claimed like constitutional deprivations, and sought declaratory and injunctive relief. The Does alleged that they were a childless couple; that Mrs. Doe was suffering from a "neural-chemical" disorder; that her physician had "advised her to avoid pregnancy until such time as her condition has materially improved" (although a pregnancy at the present time would not present "a serious risk" to her life); that, pursuant to medical advice, she had discontinued use of birth control pills; and that if she should become pregnant, she would want to terminate the pregnancy by an abortion performed by a competent, licensed physician under safe, clinical conditions. By an amendment to their complaint, the Does purported to sue "on behalf of themselves and all couples similarly situated."

The two actions were consolidated and heard together by a duly convened three-judge district court. The suits thus presented the situations of the pregnant single woman, the childless couple, with the wife not pregnant, and the licensed practicing physician, all joining in the attack on the Texas criminal abortion statutes. Upon the filing of affidavits, motions were made to dismiss and for summary judgment. The court held that Roe and Dr. Hallford, and members of their respective classes, had standing to sue, and presented justiciable controversies, but that the Does had failed to allege facts sufficient to state a present controversy and did not have standing. It concluded that, with respect to the requests for a declaratory judgment, abstention was not warranted. On the merits, the District Court held that the "fundamental right of single women and married persons to choose whether to have children is protected by the Ninth Amendment, through the Fourteenth Amendment," and that the Texas criminal abortion statutes were void on their face because they were both unconstitutionally vague and constituted an overbroad infringement of the plaintiffs' Ninth Amendment rights. The court then held that abstention was warranted with respect to the requests for an injunction. It therefore dismissed the Doe complaint, declared the abortion statutes void, and dismissed the application for injunctive relief. 314 F. Supp. 1217 (ND Tex. 1970).

The plaintiffs Roe and Doe and the intervenor Hallford, pursuant to 28 U. S. C. § 1253, have appealed to this Court from that part of the District Court's judgment denying the injunction. The defendant District Attorney has purported to cross appeal, pursuant to the same statute, from the court's grant of declaratory relief to Roe and Hallford. Both sides also have taken protective appeals to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. That court ordered the appeals held in abeyance pending decision here. We postponed decision on jurisdiction to the hearing on the merits. 402 U. S. 941 (1971).

III

It might have been preferable if the defendant, pursuant to our Rule 20, had presented to us a petition for certiorari before judgment in the Court of Appeals with respect to the granting of the plaintiffs' prayer for declaratory relief. Our decisions in Mitchell v. Donovan, 398 U. S. 427 (1970), and Gunn v. University Committee, 399 U. S. 383 (1970), are to the effect that § 1253 does not authorize an appeal to this Court from the grant or denial of declaratory relief alone. We conclude, nevertheless, that those decisions do not foreclose our review of both the injunctive and the declaratory aspects of a case of this kind when it is properly here, as this one is, on appeal under § 1253 from specific denial of injunctive relief, and the arguments as to both aspects are necessarily identical. See Carter v. Jury Commission, 396 U. S. 320 (1970); Florida Lime and Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Jacobsen, 362 U. S. 73, 80–81 (1960). It would be destructive of time and energy for all concerned were we to rule otherwise. Cf. Doe v. Bolton, post, —.

IV

We are next confronted with issues of justiciability, standing, and abstention. Have Roe and the Does established that "personal stake in the outcome of the controversy," Baker v. Carr, 369 U. S. 186, 204 (1962), that insures that "the dispute sought to be adjudicated will be presented in an adversary context and in a form historically viewed as capable of judicial resolution," Flast v. Cohen, 392 U. S. 83, 101 (1968), and Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U. S. 727, 732 (1972)? And what effect did the pendency of criminal abortion charges against Dr. Hallford in state court have upon the propriety of the federal court's granting relief to him as a plaintiff-intervenor?

A. Jane Roe. Despite the use of the pseudonym, no suggestion is made that Roe is a fictitious person. For purposes of her case, we accept as true, and as established, her existence; her pregnant state, as of the inception of her suit in March 1970 and as late as May 21 of that year when she filed an alias affidavit with the District Court; and her inability to obtain a legal abortion in Texas.

Viewing Roe's case as of the time of its filing and thereafter until as late as May, there can be little dispute that it then presented a case or controversy and that, wholly apart from the class aspects, she, as a pregnant single woman thwarted by the Texas criminal abortion laws, had standing to challenge those statutes. Abele v. Markle, 452 F. 2d 1121, 1125 (CA2 1971); Crossen v. Breckenridge, 446 F. 2d 833, 838–839 (CA6 1971); Poe v. Menghini, 339 F. Supp. 986, 990–991 (Kans. 1972). See Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33 (1915). Indeed, we do not read the appellee's brief as really asserting anything to the contrary. The "logical nexus between the status asserted and the claim sought to be adjudicated," Flast v. Cohen, 392 U. S., at 102, and the necessary degree of contentiousness, Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U. S. 103 (1969), are both present.

The appellee notes, however, that the record does not disclose that Roe was pregnant at the time of the District Court hearing on May 22, 1970,[6] or on the following June 17 when the court's opinion and judgment were filed. And he suggests that Roe's case must now be moot because she and all other members of her class are no longer subject to any 1970 pregnancy.

[6] The appellee twice states in his brief that the hearing before the District Court was held on July 22, 1970. Appellee's Brief 13. The docket entries, Appendix, at 2, and the transcript, Appendix, at 76, reveal this to be an error. The July date appears to be the time of the reporter's transcription. See Appendix, at 77.

The usual rule in federal cases is that an actual controversy must exist at stages of appellate or certiorari review, and not simply at the date the action is initiated. United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U. S. 36 (1950); Golden v. Zwickler, supra; SEC v. Medical Committee for Human Rights, 404 U. S. 403 (1972).

But when, as here, pregnancy is a significant fact in the litigation, the normal 266-day human gestation period is so short that the pregnancy will come to term before the usual appellate process is complete. If that termination makes a case moot, pregnancy litigation seldom will survive much beyond the trial stage, and appellate review will be effectively denied. Our law should not be that rigid. Pregnancy often comes more than once to the same woman, and in the general population, if man is to survive, it will always be with us. Pregnancy provides a classic justification for a conclusion of nonmootness. It truly could be "capable of repetition, yet evading review." Southern Pacific Terminal Co. v. ICC, 219 U. S. 498, 515 (1911). See Moore v. Ogilvie, 394 U. S. 814, 816 (1969); Carroll v. President and Commissioners, 393 U. S. 175, 178–179 (1968); United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U. S. 629, 632–633 (1953).

We therefore agree with the District Court that Jane Roe had standing to undertake this litigation, that she presented a justiciable controversy, and that the termination of her 1970 pregnancy has not rendered her case moot.

B. Dr. Hallford. The doctor's position is different. He entered Roe's litigation as a plaintiff-intervenor alleging in his complaint that he:

> "In the past has been arrested for violating the Texas Abortion Laws and at the present time stands charged by indictment with violating said laws in the Criminal District Court of Dallas County, Texas to-wit: (1) The State of Texas vs.

James H. Hallford, No. C–69–5307–IH, and (2) The State of Texas vs. James H. Hallford, No. C–69–2524–H. In both cases the defendant is charged with abortion. . . ."

In his application for leave to intervene the doctor made like representations as to the abortion charges pending in the state court. These representations were also repeated in the affidavit he executed and filed in support of his motion for summary judgment.

Dr. Hallford is therefore in the position of seeking, in a federal court, declaratory and injunctive relief with respect to the same statutes under which he stands charged in criminal prosecutions simultaneously pending in state court. Although he stated that he has been arrested in the past for violating the State's abortion laws, he makes no allegation of any substantial and immediate threat to any federally protected right that cannot be asserted in his defense against the state prosecutions. Neither is there any allegation of harassment or bad faith prosecution. In order to escape the rule, articulated in the cases cited in the next paragraph of this opinion, that, absent harassment and bad faith, a defendant in a pending state criminal case cannot affirmatively challenge in federal court the statutes under which the State is prosecuting him, Dr. Hallford seeks to distinguish his status as a present state defendant from his status as a "potential future defendant" and to assert only the latter for standing purposes here.

We see no merit in that distinction. Our decision in Samuels v. Mackell, 401 U. S. 66 (1971), compels the conclusion that the District Court erred when it granted declaratory relief to Dr. Hallford instead of refraining from so doing. The court, of course, was correct in refusing to grant injuctive relief to the doctor. The reasons supportive of that action, however, are those expressed in Samuels v. Mackell, supra, and in Younger v.

Harris, 401 U. S. 37 (1971); Boyle v. Landry, 401 U. S. 77 (1971); Perez v. Ledesma, 401 U. S. 82 (1971); and Byrne v. Karalexis, 401 U. S. 216 (1971). See also Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U. S. 479 (1965). We note, in passing, that Younger and its companion cases were decided after the three-judge District Court decision in this case.

Dr. Hallford's complaint in intervention, therefore, is to be dismissed.[7] He is remitted to his defenses in the state criminal proceedings against him. We reverse the judgment of the District Court insofar as it granted Dr. Hallford relief and failed to dismiss his complaint in intervention.

C. The Does. In view of our ruling as to Roe's standing in her case, the issue of the Does' standing in their case has little significance. The claims they assert are essentially the same as those of Roe, and they attack the same statutes. Nevertheless, we briefly note the Does' posture.

Their pleadings present them as a childless married couple, the woman not being pregnant, who have no desire to have children at this time because of their having received medical advice that Mrs. Doe should avoid pregnancy, and for "other highly personal reasons." But they "fear . . . they may face the prospect of becoming parents." And if pregnancy ensues, they "would want to terminate" it by an abortion. They assert an inability to obtain an abortion legally in Texas and, consequently, the prospect of obtaining an illegal abortion there or of going outside Texas to some place where the procedure could be obtained legally and competently.

[7] We need not consider what different result, if any, would follow if Dr. Hallford's intervention were on behalf of a class. His complaint in intervention does not purport to assert a class suit and makes no reference to any class apart from an allegation that he "and others similarly situated" must necessarily guess at the meaning of Art. 1196. His application for leave to intervene goes somewhat further for it asserts that plaintiff Roe does not adequately protect the interest of the doctor "and the class of people who are physicians . . . and the class of people who are . . . patients . . . ." The leave application, however, is not the complaint. Despite the District Court's statement to the contrary, 314 F. Supp., at 1225, we fail to perceive the essentials of a class suit in the Hallford complaint.

We thus have as plaintiffs a married couple who have, as their asserted immediate and present injury, only an alleged "detrimental effect upon [their] marital happiness" because they are forced to "the choice of refraining from normal sexual relations or of endangering Mary Doe's health through a possible pregnancy." Their claim is that sometime, in the future, Mrs. Doe might become pregnant because of possible failure of contraceptive measures, and at that time in the future, she might want an abortion that might then be illegal under the Texas statutes.

This very phrasing of the Does' position reveals its speculative character. Their alleged injury rests on possible future contraceptive failure, possible future pregnancy, possible future unpreparedness for parenthood, and possible future impairment of health. Any one or more of these several possibilities may not take place and all may not combine. In the Does' estimation, these possibilities might have some real or imagined impact upon their marital happiness. But we are not prepared to say that the bare allegation of so indirect an injury is sufficient to present an actual case or controversy. Younger v. Harris, 401 U. S., at 41–42; Golden v. Zwickler, 394 U. S., at 109–110 (1969); Abele v. Markle, 452 F. 2d, at 1124–1125; Crossen v. Breckenridge, 446 F. 2d, at 839. The Does' claim falls far short of those resolved otherwise in the cases that the Does urge upon us, namely, Investment Co. Institute v. Camp, 401 U. S. 617 (1971);

Data Processing Service v. Camp, 397 U. S. 150 (1970); and Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U. S. 97 (1968). See also Truax v. Raich, supra.

The Does therefore are not appropriate plaintiffs in this litigation. Their complaint was properly dismissed by the District Court, and we affirm that dismissal.

V

The principal thrust of appellant's attack on the Texas statutes is that they improperly invade a right, said to be possessed by the pregnant woman, to choose to terminate her pregnancy. Appellant would discover this right in the concept of personal "liberty" embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause; or in personal, marital, familial, and sexual privacy said to be protected by the Bill of Rights or its penumbras, see Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U. S. 438 (1972); id., at 460 (WHITE, J., concurring); or among those rights reserved to the people by the Ninth Amendment, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S., at 486 (Goldberg, J., concurring). Before addressing this claim, we feel it desirable briefly to survey, in several aspects, the history of abortion, for such insight as that history may afford us, and then to examine the state purposes and interests behind the criminal abortion laws.

VI

It perhaps is not generally appreciated that the restrictive criminal abortion laws in effect in a majority of States today are of relatively recent vintage. Those laws, generally proscribing abortion or its attempt at any time during pregnancy except when necessary to preserve the pregnant woman's life, are not of ancient or even of common law origin. Instead, they derive from statutory changes effected, for the most part, in the latter half of the 19th century.

1. Ancient attitudes. These are not capable of precise determination. We are told that at the time of the Persian Empire abortifacients were known and that criminal abortions were severely punished.[8] We are also told, however, that abortion was practiced in Greek times as well as in the Roman Era,[9] and that "it was resorted to without scruple." [10] The Ephesian, Soranos, often described as the greatest of the ancient gynecologists, appears to have been generally opposed to Rome's prevailing free-abortion practices. He found it necessary to think first of the life of the mother, and he resorted to abortion when, upon this standard, he felt the procedure advisable.[11] Greek and Roman law afforded little protection to the unborn. If abortion was prosecuted in some places, it seems to have been based on a concept of a violation of the father's right to his offspring. Ancient religion did not bar abortion.[12]

2. The Hippocratic Oath. What then of the famous Oath that has stood so long as the ethical guide of the medical profession and that bears the name of the great Greek (460(?)–377(?) B. C.), who has been described as the Father of Medicine, the "wisest and the greatest practioner of his art," and the "most important and most complete medical personality of antiquity," who dominated the medical schools of his time, and who typified the sum of the medical knowledge of the past? [13] The Oath varies somewhat according to the particular translation, but in any translation the content is clear: "I will give no deadly medicine to anyone if asked, nor suggest any such counsel; and in like manner I will not give to a woman a pessary to produce abortion," [14] or "I will neither give a deadly drug to anybody if asked for it, nor will I make a suggestion to this effect. Similarly, I will not give to a woman an abortive remedy." [15]

Although the Oath is not mentioned in any of the principal briefs in this case or in Doe v. Bolton, post, it represents the apex of the development of strict ethical concepts in medicine, and its influence endures to this day. Why did not the authority of Hippocrates dissuade abortion practice in his time and that of Rome? The late Dr. Edelstein provides us with a theory: [16] The Oath was not uncontested even in Hippocrates' day; only the Pythagorean school of philosophers frowned upon the related act of suicide. Most Greek thinkers, on the other hand, commended abortion, at least prior to viability. See Plato, Republic, V, 461; Aristotle, Politics, VII, 1335 b 25. For the Pythagoreans, however, it was a matter of dogma. For them the embryo was animate from the moment of conception, and abortion meant destruction of a living being. The abortion clause of the Oath, therefore, "echoes Pythagorean doctrines," and "[i]n no other stratum of Greek opinion were such views held or proposed in the same spirit of uncompromising austerity." [17]

Edelstein then concludes that the Oath originated in a group representing only a small segment of Greek opinion and that it certainly was not accepted by all ancient physicians. He points out that medical writings down to Galen (130–200 A. D.) "give evidence of the violation of almost every one of its injunctions." [18] But with the end of antiquity a decided change took place. Resistance against suicide and against abortion became common. The Oath came to be popular. The emerging teachings of Christianity were in agreement with the Pythagorean ethic. The Oath "became the nucleus of all medical ethics" and "was applauded as the embodiment of truth." Thus, suggests Dr. Edelstein, it is "a Pythagorean manifesto and not the expression of an absolute standard of medical conduct." [19]

This, it seems to us, is a satisfactory and acceptable explanation of the Hippocratic Oath's apparent rigidity. It enables us to understand, in historical context, a long accepted and revered statement of medical ethics.

3. The Common Law. It is undisputed that at the common law, abortion performed before "quickening"—the first recognizable movement of the fetus in utero, appearing usually from the 16th to the 18th week of pregnancy [20]—was not an indictable offense.[21] The absence of a common law crime for pre-quickening abortion appears to have developed from a confluence of earlier philosophical, theological, and civil and canon law concepts of when life begins. These disciplines variously approached the question in terms of the point at which the embryo or fetus became "formed" or recognizably human, or in terms of when a "person" came into being, that is, infused with a "soul" or "animated." A loose consensus evolved in early English law that these events occurred at some point between conception and live birth.[22] This was "mediate animation." Although [22] Early philosophers believed that the embryo or fetus did not become formed and begin to live until at least 40 days after conception for a male, and 80 to 90 days for a female. See, for example, Aristotle, Hist. Anim. 7.3.583b; Gen. Anim. 2.3.736, 2.5.741; Hippocrates, Lib. de Nat. Puer., No. 10. Aristotle's thinking derived from his three-stage theory of life: vegetable, animal, rational. The vegetable stage was reached at conception, the animal at "animation," and the rational soon after live birth. This theory, together with the 40/80 day view, came to be accepted by early Christian thinkers.

The theological debate was reflected in the writings of St. Augustine, who made a distinction between embryo inanimatus, not yet endowed with a soul, and embryo animatus. He may have drawn upon Exodus xxi, 22. At one point, however, he expresses the view that human powers cannot determine the point during fetal development at which the critical change occurs. See Augustine, De Origine Animae 4.4 (Pub. Law 44.527). See also Reany, The Creation of the Human Soul, c. 2 and 83–86 (1932); Huser, The Crime of Abortion in Common Law 15 (Catholic Univ. of America, Canon Law Studies No. 162, Washington, D. C. 1942).

Galen, in three treatises related to embryology, accepted the thinking of Aristotle and his followers. Quay 426–427. Later, Augustine on abortion was incorporated by Gratian into the Decretum, published about 1140. Decretum Magistri Gratiani 2.32.2.7 to 2.32.2.10, Christian theology and the canon law came to fix the point of animation at 40 days for a male and 80 days for a female, a view that persisted until the 19th century, there was otherwise little agreement about the precise time of formation or animation. There was agreement, however, that prior to this point the fetus was to be regarded as part of the mother and its destruction, therefore, was not homicide. Due to continued uncertainty about the precise time when animation occurred, to the lack of any empirical basis for the 40–80 day view, and perhaps to Acquinas' definition of movement as one of the two first principles of life, Bracton focused upon quickening as the critical point. The significance of quickening was echoed by later common law scholars and found its way into the received common law in this country.

Whether abortion of a quick fetus was a felony at common law, or even a lesser crime, is still disputed. Bracton, writing early in the 13th century, thought it homicide.[23] But the later and predominant view, following the great common law scholars, has been that in 1 Corpus Juris Canonici 1122, 1123 (2d ed. Friedberg ed. 1879). Gratian, together with the decretals that followed, were recognized as the definitive body of canon law until the new Code of 1917.

For discussions of the canon law treatment, see Means I, at 411–412; Noonan, 20–26; Quay 426–430; see also Noonan, Contraception: A History of Its Treatment by the Catholic Theologians and Canonists 18–29 (1965).

[23] Bracton took the position that abortion by blow or poison was homicide "if the foetus be already formed and animated, and particularly if it be animated." 2 H. Bracton, De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliae 279 (Twiss ed. 1879), or, as a later translation puts it, "if the foetus is already formed or quickened, especially if it is quickened." II Bracton, On the Laws and Customs of England 341 (Thorne ed. 1968). See Quay 431; see also 2 Fleta 60–61 (Book I, c. 23) (Selden Society ed. 1955).

it was at most a lesser offense. In a frequently cited passage, Coke took the position that abortion of a woman "quick with childe" is "a great misprision and no murder." [24] Blackstone followed, saying that while abortion after quickening had once been considered manslaughter (though not murder), "modern law" took a less severe view.[25] A recent review of the common law precedents argues, however, that those precedents contradict Coke and that even post-quickening abortion was never established as a common law crime.[26] This is of some importance because while most American courts ruled, in holding or dictum, that abortion of an unquickened fetus was not criminal under their received common law,[27] others followed Coke in stating that abor-

Forum 335 (1971) (hereinafter "Means II"). The author examines the two principal precedents cited marginally by Coke, both contrary to his dictum, and traces the treatment of these and other cases by earlier commentators. He concludes that Coke, who himself participated as an advocate in an abortion case in 1601, may have intentionally misstated the law. The author even suggests a reason: Coke's strong feelings against abortion, coupled with his determination to assert common law (secular) jurisdiction to assess penalties for an offence that traditionally had been an exclusively ecclesiastical or canon law crime. See also Lader 78–79, who notes that some scholars doubt the common law ever was applied to abortion; that the English ecclesiastical courts seem to have lost interest in the problem after 1527; and that the preamble to the English legislation of 1803, 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, § 1, at 203, referred to in the text, infra, states that "no adequate means have been hitherto provided for the prevention and punishment of such offenses."

tion of a quick fetus was a "misprision," a term they translated to mean "misdemeanor." [28] That their reliance on Coke on this aspect of the law was uncritical and, apparently in all the reported cases, dictum (due probably to the paucity of common law prosecutions for post-quickening abortion), makes it now appear doubtful that abortion was ever firmly established as a common law crime even with respect to the destruction of a quick fetus.

4. The English statutory law. England's first criminal abortion statute, Lord Ellenborough's Act, 43 Geo. 3, c. 58, came in 1803. It made abortion of a quick fetus, § 1, a capital crime, but in § 2 it provided lesser penalties for the felony of abortion before quickening, and thus preserved the quickening distinction. This contrast was continued in the general revision of 1828, 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, § 13, at 104. It disappeared, however, together with the death penalty, in 1837, 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vic., c. 85, § 6, at 360, and did not reappear in the Offenses Against the Person Act of 1861, 24 & 25 Vic., c. 100, § 59, at 438, that formed the core of English anti-abortion law until the liberalizing reforms of 1967. In 1929 the Infant Life (Preservation) Act, 19 & 20 Geo. 5, c. 34, came into being. Its emphasis was upon the destruction of "the life of a child capable of being born alive." It made a willful act performed with the necessary intent a felony. It contained a proviso that one was not to be found guilty of the offense "unless it is proved that the act which caused the death of the child was not done in good faith for the purpose only of preserving the life of the mother."

A seemingly notable development in the English law was the case of Rex v. Bourne, [1939] 1 K. B. 687. This case apparently answered in the affirmative the question whether an abortion necessary to preserve the life of the pregnant woman was excepted from the criminal penalties of the 1861 Act. In his instructions to the jury Judge Macnaghten referred to the 1929 Act, and observed, p. 691, that that Act related to "the case where a child is killed by a willful act at the time when it is being delivered in the ordinary course of nature." Id., at 91. He concluded that the 1861 Act's use of the word "unlawfully," imported the same meaning expressed by the specific proviso in the 1929 Act even though there was no mention of preserving the mother's life in the 1861 Act. He then construed the phrase "preserving the life of the mother" broadly, that is, "in a reasonable sense," to include a serious and permanent threat to the mother's health, and instructed the jury to acquit Dr. Bourne if it found he had acted in a good faith belief that the abortion was necessary for this purpose. Id., at 693–694. The jury did acquit.

Recently Parliament enacted a new abortion law. This is the Abortion Act of 1967, 15 & 16 Eliz. 2, c. 87. The Act permits a licensed physician to perform an abortion where two other licensed physicians agree (a) "that the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk to the life of the pregnant woman, or of injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman or any existing children of her family, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated," or (b) "that there is a substantial risk that if the child were born it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped." The Act also provides that, in making this determination, "account may be taken of the pregnant woman's actual or reasonably forseeable environment." It also permits a physician, without the concurrence of others, to terminate a pregnancy where he is of the good faith opinion that the abortion "is immediately necessary to save the life or to prevent grave permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman."

5. The American law. In this country the law in effect in all but a few States until mid-19th century was the pre-existing English common law. Connecticut, the first State to enact abortion legislation, adopted in 1821 that part of Lord Ellenborough's Act that related to a woman "quick with child." [29] The death penalty was not imposed. Abortion before quickening was made a crime in that State only in 1860.[30] In 1828 New York enacted legislation [31] that, in two respects, was to serve as a model for early anti-abortion statutes. First, while barring destruction of an unquickened fetus as well as a quick fetus, it made the former only a misdemeanor, but the latter second-degree manslaughter. Second, it incorporated a concept of therapeutic abortion by providing that an abortion was excused if it "shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such mother, or shall have been advised by two physicians to be necessary for such purpose." By 1840, when Texas had received the common law,[32] only eight American States had statutes dealing with abortion.[33] It was not until after the War Between the States that legislation began generally to replace the common law. Most of these initial statutes dealt severely with abortion after quickening but were lenient with it before quickening. Most punished attempts equally with completed abortions. While many statutes included the exception for an abortion thought by one or more physicians to be necessary to save the mother's life, that provision soon disappeared and the typical law required that the procedure actually be necessary for that purpose.

Gradually, in the middle and late 19th century the quickening distinction disappeared from the statutory law of most States and the degree of the offense and the penalties were increased. By the end of the 1950's, a large majority of the States banned abortion, however and whenever performed, unless done to save or preserve the life of the mother.[34] The exceptions, Alabama and the District of Columbia, permitted abortion to preserve the mother's health.[35] Three other States permitted abortions that were not "unlawfully" performed or that were not "without lawful justification," leaving interpretation of those standards to the courts.[36] In the past several years, however, a trend toward liberalization of abortion statutes has resulted in adoption, by about one-third of the States, of less stringent laws, most of them patterned after the ALI Model Penal Code, § 230.3,[37] set forth as Appendix B to the opinion in Doe v. Bolton, post ——.

It is thus apparent that at common law, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and throughout the major portion of the 19th century, abortion was viewed with less disfavor than under most American statutes currently in effect. Phrasing it another way, a woman enjoyed a substantially broader right to terminate a pregnancy than she does in most States today. At least with respect to the early stage of pregnancy, and very possibly without such a limitation, the opportunity to make this choice was present in this country [37] Fourteen States have adopted some form of the ALI statute. See Ark. Stat. Ann. §§ 41-303 to 41-310 (Supp. 1971); Calif. Health and Safety Code §§ 25950-25955.5 (West Supp. 1972); Colo. Rev. A.) L. Rev. 1, 11 (1969).

By the end of 1970, four other States had repealed criminal penalties for abortions performed in early pregnancy by a licensed physician, subject to stated procedural and health requirements. Alaska Stat. § 11.15.060 (1970); Haw. Rev. Stat. § 453-16 (Supp. 1971); N. Y. Penal Code § 125.05 (McKinney Supp. 1972-1973); Wash. Rev. Code §§ 9.02.060 to 9.02.080 (Supp. 1972). The precise status of criminal abortion laws in some States is made unclear by recent decisions in state and federal courts striking down existing state laws, in whole or in part.

well into the 19th century. Even later, the law continued for some time to treat less punitively an abortion procured in early pregnancy.

6. The position of the American Medical Association. The anti-abortion mood prevalent in this country in the late 19th century was shared by the medical profession. Indeed, the attitude of the profession may have played a significant role in the enactment of stringent criminal abortion legislation during that period.

An AMA Committee on Criminal Abortion was appointed in May 1857. It presented its report, 12 Trans. of the Am. Med. Assn. 73–77 (1859), to the Twelfth Annual Meeting. That report observed that the Committee had been appointed to investigate criminal abortion "with a view to its general suppression." It deplored abortion and its frequency and it listed three causes "of this general demoralization":

> "The first of these causes is a wide-spread popular ignorance of the true character of the crime—a belief, even among mothers themselves, that the foetus is not alive till after the period of quickening.
>
> "The second of the agents alluded to is the fact that the profession themselves are frequently supposed careless of foetal life . . . .
>
> "The third reason of the frightful extent of this crime is found in the grave defects of our laws, both common and statute, as regards the independent and actual existence of the child before birth, as a living being. These errors, which are sufficient in most instances to prevent conviction, are based, and only based, upon mistaken and exploded medical dogmas. With strange inconsistency, the law fully acknowledges the foetus in utero and its inherent rights, for civil purposes; while personally and as criminally affected, it fails to recognize it, and to its life as yet denies all protection." Id., at 75–76.

The Committee then offered, and the Association adopted, resolutions protesting "against such unwarrantable destruction of human life," calling upon state legislatures to revise their abortion laws, and requesting the cooperation of state medical societies "in pressing the subject." Id., at 28, 78.

In 1871 a long and vivid report was submitted by the Committee on Criminal Abortion. It ended with the observation, "We had to deal with human life. In a matter of less importance we could entertain no compromise. An honest judge on the bench would call things by their proper names. We could do no less." 22 Trans. of the Am. Med. Assn. 258 (1871). It proffered resolutions, adopted by the Association, id., at 38–39, recommending, among other things, that it "be unlawful and unprofessional for any physician to induce abortion or premature labor, without the concurrent opinion of at least one respectable consulting physician, and then always with a view to the safety of the child—if that be possible," and calling "the attention of the clergy of all denominations to the perverted views of morality entertained by a large class of females—aye, and men also, on this important question."

Except for periodic condemnation of the criminal abortionist, no further formal AMA action took place until 1967. In that year the Committee on Human Reproduction urged the adoption of a stated policy of opposition to induced abortion except when there is "documented medical evidence" of a threat to the health or life of the mother, or that the child "may be born with incapacitating physical deformity or mental deficiency," or that a pregnancy "resulting from legally established statutory or forcible rape or incest may constitute a threat to the mental or physical health of the patient," and two other physicians "chosen because of their recognized professional competence have examined the patient and have concurred in writing," and the procedure "is performed in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals." The providing of medical information by physicians to state legislatures in their consideration of legislation regarding therapeutic abortion was "to be considered consistent with the principles of ethics of the American Medical Association." This recommendation was adopted by the House of Delegates. Proceedings of the AMA House of Delegates, 40–51 (June 1967).

In 1970, after the introduction of a variety of proposed resolutions, and of a report from its Board of Trustees, a reference committee noted "polarization of the medical profession on this controversial issue"; division among those who had testified; a difference of opinion among AMA councils and committees; "the remarkable shift in testimony" in six months, felt to be influenced "by the rapid changes in state laws and by the judicial decisions which tend to make abortion more freely available;" and a feeling "that this trend will continue." On June 25, 1970, the House of Delegates adopted preambles and most of the resolutions proposed by the reference committee. The preambles emphasized "the best interests of the patient," "sound clinical judgment," and "informed patient consent," in contrast to "mere acquiescence to the patient's demand." The resolutions asserted that abortion is a medical procedure that should be performed by a licensed physician in an accredited hospital only after consultation with two other physicians and in conformity with state law, and that no party to the procedure should be required to violate personally held moral principles.[38] Proceedings

7. The position of the American Public Health Association. In October 1970, the Executive Board of the APHA adopted Standards for Abortion Services. These were five in number:

"a. Rapid and simple abortion referral must be readily available through state and local public

"RESOLVED, That no physician or other professional personnel shall be compelled to perform any act which violates his good medical judgment. Neither physician, hospital, nor hospital personnel shall be required to perform any act violative of personally-held moral principles. In these circumstances good medical practice requires only that the physician or other professional personnel withdraw from the case so long as the withdrawal is consistent with good medical practice." Proceedings of the AMA House of Delegates 221 (June 1970).

[39] "The Principles of Medical Ethics of the AMA do not prohibit a physician from performing an abortion that is performed in accordance with good medical practice and under circumstances that do not violate the laws of the community in which he practices.

health departments, medical societies, or other nonprofit organizations.

"b. An important function of counseling should be to simplify and expedite the provision of abortion services; it should not delay the obtaining of these services.

"c. Psychiatric consultation should not be mandatory. As in the case of other specialized medical services, psychiatric consultation should be sought for definite indications and not on a routine basis.

"d. A wide range of individuals from appropriately trained, sympathetic volunteers to highly skilled physicians may qualify as abortion counselors.

"e. Contraception and/or sterilization should be discussed with each abortion patient." Recommended Standards for Abortion Services, 61 Am. J. Pub. Health 396 (1971).

Among factors pertinent to life and health risks associated with abortion were three that "are recognized as important":

"a. the skill of the physician,

"b. the environment in which the abortion is performed, and above all

"c. the duration of pregnancy, as determined by uterine size and confirmed by menstrual history." Id., at 397.

It was said that "a well-equipped hospital" offers more protection "to cope with unforeseen difficulties than an office or clinic without such resources. . . . The factor of gestational age is of overriding importance." Thus it was recommended that abortions in the second trimester and early abortions in the presence of existing medical complications be performed in hospitals as inpatient procedures. For pregnancies in the first trimester, abortion in the hospital with or without overnight stay "is probably the safest practice." An abortion in an extramural facility, however, is an acceptable alternative "provided arrangements exist in advance to admit patients promptly if unforeseen complications develop." Standards for an abortion facility were listed. It was said that at present abortions should be performed by physicians or osteopaths who are licensed to practice and who have "adequate training." Id., at 398.

8. The position of the American Bar Association. At its meeting in February 1972 the ABA House of Delegates approved, with 17 opposing votes, the Uniform Abortion Act that had been drafted and approved the preceding August by the Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. 58 A. B. A. J. 380 (1972). We set forth the Act in full in the margin.[40] The

"SECTION 1. [Abortion Defined; When Authorized.]

"(a) 'Abortion' means the termination of human pregnancy with an intention other than to produce a live birth or to remove a dead fetus.

"(b) An abortion may be performed in this state only if it is performed:

"(1) by a physician licensed to practice medicine [or osteopathy] in this state or by a physician practicing medicine [or osteopathy] in the employ of the government of the United States or of this state, [and the abortion is performed [in the physician's office or in a medical clinic, or] in a hospital approved by the [Department of Health] or operated by the United States, this state, or any department, agency, or political subdivision of either;] or by a female upon herself upon the advice of the physician; and

"(2) within [20] weeks after the commencement of the pregnancy [or after [20] weeks only if the physician has reasonable cause to believe (i) there is a substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the mother or would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother, (ii) that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or (iii) that the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest, or illicit intercourse with a girl under the age of 16 years of age].

"SECTION 2. [Penalty.] Any person who performs or procures an abortion other than authorized by this Act is guilty of a [felony] and, upon conviction thereof, may be sentenced to pay a fine not exceeding [$1,000] or to imprisonment [in the state penitentiary] not exceeding [5 years], or both.

"SECTION 3. [Uniformity of Interpretation.] This Act shall be construed to effectuate its general purpose to make uniform the law with respect to the subject of this Act among those states which enact it.

"SECTION 4. [Short Title.] This Act may be cited as the Uniform Abortion Act.

"SECTION 5. [Severability.] If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the invalidity does not affect other provisions or applications of this Act which can be given effect without the invalid provision or application, and to this end the provisions of this Act are severable.

[41] "This Act is based largely upon the New York abortion act following a review of the more recent laws on abortion in several states and upon recognition of a more liberal trend in laws on this subject. Recognition was given also to the several decisions in state and federal courts which show a further trend toward liberalization of abortion laws, especially during the first trimester of pregnancy.

"Recognizing that a number of problems appeared in New York, a shorter time period for 'unlimited' abortions was advisable. The time period was bracketed to permit the various states to insert a figure more in keeping with the different conditions that might exist among the states. Likewise, the language limiting the place or places in which abortions may be performed was also bracketed to account for different conditions among the states. In addition, limitations on abortions after the initial 'unlimited' period were placed

It has been argued occasionally that these laws were the product of a Victorian social concern to discourage illicit sexual conduct. Texas, however, does not advance this justification in the present case, and it appears that no court or commentator has taken the argument seriously.[42] The appellants and amici contend, moreover, that this is not a proper state purpose at all and suggest that, if it were, the Texas statutes are overbroad in protecting it since the law fails to distinguish between married and unwed mothers.

A second reason is concerned with abortion as a medical procedure. When most criminal abortion laws were first enacted, the procedure was a hazardous one for the woman.[43] This was particularly true prior to the development of antisepsis. Antiseptic techniques, of course, were based on discoveries by Lister, Pasteur, and others first announced in 1867, but were not generally accepted and employed until about the turn of the century. Abortion mortality was high. Even after 1900, and perhaps until as late as the development of antibiotics in the 1940's, standard modern techniques such as dila-

"This Act does not contain any provision relating to medical review committees or prohibitions against sanctions imposed upon medical personnel refusing to participate in abortions because of religious or other similar reasons, or the like. Such provisions, while related, do not directly pertain to when, where, or by whom abortions may be performed; however, the Act is not drafted to exclude such a provision by a state wishing to enact the same."

[42] See, for example, YWCA v. Kugler, 342 F. Supp. 1048, 1074 (N. J. 1972); Abele v. Markle, 342 F. tion and curettage were not nearly so safe as they are today. Thus it has been argued that a State's real concern in enacting a criminal abortion law was to protect the pregnant woman, that is, to restrain her from submitting to a procedure that placed her life in serious jeopardy.

Modern medical techniques have altered this situation. Appellants and various amici refer to medical data indicating that abortion in early pregnancy, that is, prior to the end of first trimester, although not without its risk, is now relatively safe. Mortality rates for women undergoing early abortions, where the procedure is legal, appear to be as low as or lower than the rates for normal childbirth.[44] Consequently, any interest of the State in protecting the woman from an inherently hazardous procedure, except when it would be equally dangerous for her to forgo it, has largely disappeared. Of course, important state interests in the area of health and medical standards do remain. The State has a legitimate interest in seeing to it that abortion, like any other medical procedure, is performed under circumstances that insure maximum safety for the patient. This interest obviously extends at least to the performing physician and his staff, to the facilities involved, to the availability of after-care, and to adequate provision for any complication or emergency that might arise. The prevalence of high mortality rates at illegal "abortion mills" strengthens, rather than weakens, the State's interest in regulating the conditions under which abortions are performed. Moreover, the risk to the woman increases as her pregnancy continues. Thus the State retains a definite interest in protecting the woman's own health and safety when an abortion is proposed at a late stage of pregnancy.

The third reason is the State's interest—some phrase it in terms of duty—in protecting prenatal life. Some of the argument for this justification rests on the theory that a new human life is present from the moment of conception.[45] The State's interest and general obligation to protect life then extends, it is argued, to prenatal life. Only when the life of the pregnant mother herself is at stake, balanced against the life she carries within her, should the interest of the embryo or fetus not prevail. Logically, of course, a legitimate state interest in this area need not stand or fall on acceptance of the belief that life begins at conception or at some other point prior to live birth. In assessing the State's interest, recognition may be given to the less rigid claim that as long as at least potential life is involved, the State may assert interests beyond the protection of the pregnant woman alone.

Parties challenging state abortion laws have sharply disputed in some courts the contention that a purpose of these laws, when enacted, was to protect prenatal life.[46] Pointing to the absence of legislative history to support the contention, they claim that most state laws were designed solely to protect the woman. Because medical advances have lessened this concern, at least with respect to abortion in early pregnancy, they argue that with respect to such abortions the laws can no longer be justified by any state interest. There is some scholarly support for this view of original purpose.[47] The few state courts called upon to interpret their laws in the late 19th and early 20th centuries did focus on the State's interest in protecting the woman's health rather than in preserving the embryo and fetus.[48] Proponents of this view point out that in many States, including Texas,[49] by statute or judicial interpretation, the pregnant woman herself could not be prosecuted for self-abortion or for cooperating in an abortion performed upon her by another.[50] They claim that adoption of the "quickening" distinction through received common law and state statutes tacitly recognizes the greater health hazards inherent in late abortion and impliedly repudiates the theory that life begins at conception.

It is with these interests, and the weight to be attached to them, that this case is concerned.

The Constitution does not explicitly mention any right of privacy. In a line of decisions, however, going back perhaps as far as Union Pacific R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 251 (1891), the Court has recognized that a right of personal privacy, or a guarantee of certain areas or zones of privacy, does exist under the Constitution. In varying contexts the Court or individual Justices have indeed found at least the roots of that right in the First Amendment, Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U. S. 557, 564 (1969); in the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, Terry v. Ohio, 392 U. S. 1, 8–9 (1968), Katz v. United States, 389 U. S. 347, 350 (1967), Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 479, 484–485 (1965); in the Ninth Amendment, id., at 486 (Goldberg, J., concurring); or in the concept of liberty guaranteed by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, see Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399 (1923). These decisions make it clear that only personal rights that can be deemed "fundamental" or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty," Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U. S. 319, 325 (1937), are included in this guarantee of personal privacy. They also make it clear that the right has some extension to activities relating to marriage, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1, 12 (1967), procreation, Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535, 541–542 (1942), contraception, Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U. S. 438, 453–454 (1972); id., at 460, 463–465 (WHITE, J., concurring), family relationships, Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U. S. 158, 166 (1944), and child rearing and education, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, 535 (1925), Meyer v. Nebraska, supra.

This right of privacy, whether it be founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action, as we feel it is, or, as the District Court determined, in the Ninth Amendment's reservation of rights to the people, is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. The detriment that the State would impose upon the pregnant woman by denying this choice altogether is apparent. Specific and direct harm medically diagnosable even in early pregnancy may be involved. Maternity, or additional offspring, may force upon the woman a distressful life and future. Psychological harm may be imminent. Mental and physical health may be taxed by child care. There is also the distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child, and there is the problem of bringing a child into a family already unable, psychologically and otherwise, to care for it. In other cases, as in this one, the additional difficulties and continuing stigma of unwed motherhood may be involved. All these are factors the woman and her responsible physician necessarily will consider in consultation.

On the basis of elements such as these, appellants and some amici argue that the woman's right is absolute and that she is entitled to terminate her pregnancy at whatever time, in whatever way, and for whatever reason she alone chooses. With this we do not agree. Appellants' arguments that Texas either has no valid interest at all in regulating the abortion decision, or no interest strong enough to support any limitation upon the woman's sole determination, is unpersuasive. The Court's decisions recognizing a right of privacy also acknowledge that some state regulation in areas protected by that right is appropriate. As noted above, a state may properly assert important interests in safeguarding health, in maintaining medical standards, and in protecting potential life. At some point in pregnancy, these respective interests become sufficiently compelling to sustain regulation of the factors that govern the abortion decision. The privacy right involved, therefore, cannot be said to be absolute. In fact, it is not clear to us that the claim asserted by some amici that one has an unlimited right to do with one's body as one pleases bears a close relationship to the right of privacy previously articulated in the Court's decisions. The Court has refused to recognize an unlimited right of this kind in the past. Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11 (1905) (vaccination); Buck v. Bell, 274 U. S. 200 (1927) (sterilization).

We therefore conclude that the right of personal privacy includes the abortion decision, but that this right is not unqualified and must be considered against important state interests in regulation.

We note that those federal and state courts that have recently considered abortion law challenges have reached the same conclusion. A majority, in addition to the District Court in the present case, have held state laws unconstitutional, at least in part, because of vagueness or because of overbreadth and abridgement of rights. Abele v. Markle, 342 F. Although the results are divided, most of these courts have agreed that the right of privacy, however based, is broad enough to cover the abortion decision; that the right, nonetheless, is not absolute and is subject to some limitations; and that at some point the state interests as to protection of health, medical standards, and prenatal life, become dominant. We agree with this approach.

Where certain "fundamental rights" are involved, the Court has held that regulation limiting these rights may be justified only by a "compelling state interest." Kramer v. Union Free School District, 395 U. S. 621, 627 (1969); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U. S. 618, 634 (1969), Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U. S. 398, 406 (1963), and that legislative enactments must be narrowly drawn to express only the legitimate state interests at stake. Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479, 485 (1965); Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U. S. 500, 508 (1964); Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 307–308 (1940); see Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U. S. 438, 460, 463–464 (1972) (WHITE, J., concurring).

In the recent abortion cases, cited above, courts have recognized these principles. Those striking down state laws have generally scrutinized the State's interest in protecting health and potential life and have concluded that neither interest justified broad limitations on the reasons for which a physician and his pregnant patient might decide that she should have an abortion in the early stages of pregnancy. Courts sustaining state laws have held that the State's determinations to protect health or prenatal life are dominant and constitutionally justifiable.

IX

The District Court held that the appellee failed to meet his burden of demonstrating that the Texas statute's infringement upon Roe's rights was necessary to support a compelling state interest, and that, although the defendant presented "several compelling justifications for state presence in the area of abortions," the statutes outstripped these justifications and swept "far beyond any areas of compelling state interest." 314 F. Supp., at 1222–1223. Appellant and appellee both contest that holding. Appellant, as has been indicated, claims an absolute right that bars any state imposition of criminal penalties in the area. Appellee argues that the State's determination to recognize and protect prenatal life from and after conception constitutes a compelling state interest. As noted above, we do not agree fully with either formulation.

A. The appellee and certain amici argue that the fetus is a "person" within the language and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. In support of this they outline at length and in detail the well-known facts of fetal development. If this suggestion of personhood is established, the appellant's case, of course, collapses, for the fetus' right to life is then guaranteed specifically by the Amendment. The appellant conceded as much on reargument.[51] On the other hand, the appellee conceded on reargument [52] that no case could be cited that holds that a fetus is a person within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Constitution does not define "person" in so many words. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment contains three references to "person." The first, in defining "citizens," speaks of "persons born or naturalized in the United States." The word also appears both in the Due Process Clause and in the Equal Protection Clause. "Person" is used in other places in the Constitution: in the listing of qualifications for representatives and senators, Art. I, § 2, cl. 2, and § 3, cl. 3; in the Apportionment Clause, Art. I, § 2, cl. 3;[53] in the Migration and Importation provision, Art. I, § 9, cl. 1; in the Emolument Clause, Art. I, § 9, cl. 8; in the Electors provisions, Art. II, § 1, cl. 2, and the superseded cl. 3; in the provision outlining qualifications for the office of President, Art. II, § 1, cl. 5; in the Extradition provisions, Art. IV, § 2, cl. 2, and the superseded Fugitive Slave cl. 3; and in the Fifth, Twelfth, and Twenty-second Amendments as well as in §§ 2 and 3 of the Fourteenth Amendment. But in nearly all these instances, the use of the word is such that it has application only postnatally. None indicates, with any assurance, that it has any possible pre-natal application.[54]

[53] We are not aware that in the taking of any census under this clause, a fetus has ever been counted.

[54] When Texas urges that a fetus is entitled to Fourteenth Amendment protection as a person, it faces a dilemma. Neither in Texas nor in any other State are all abortions prohibited. Despite broad proscription, an exception always exists. The exception contained in Art. 1196, for an abortion procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, is typical. But if the fetus is a person who is not to be deprived of life without due process of law, and if the mother's condition is the sole determinant, does not the Texas exception appear to be out of line with the Amendment's command?

There are other inconsistencies between Fourteenth Amendment status and the typical abortion statute. It has already been pointed out, n. 49, supra, that in Texas the woman is not a principal or an accomplice with respect to an abortion upon her. If the fetus is a person, why is the woman not a principal or an accomplice? Further, the penalty for criminal abortion specified by Art. 1195 is significantly less than the maximum penalty for murder prescribed

All this, together with our observation, supra, that throughout the major portion of the 19th century prevailing legal abortion practices were far freer than they are today, persuades us that the word "person," as used in the Fourteenth Amendment, does not include the unborn.[55] This is in accord with the results reached in those few cases where the issue has been squarely presented. McGarvey v. Magee-Womens Hospital, 340 F. Supp. 751 (WD Pa. 1972); Byrn v. New York City Health & Hospitals Corp., 31 N. Y. 2d 194, 286 N. E. 2d 887 (1972), appeal pending; Abele v. Markle, — F. Supp. — (Conn. Sept. 20, 1972), appeal pending. Compare Cheaney v. Indiana, — Ind. —, 285 N. E. 265, 270 (1972); Montana v. Rogers, 278 F. 2d 68, 72 (CA7 1960), aff'd sub nom. Montana v. Kennedy, 366 U. S. 308 (1961); Keeler v. Superior Court, — Cal. —, 470 P. 2d 617 (1970); State v. Dickinson, 23 Ohio App. 2d 259, 275 N. E. 2d 599 (1970). Indeed, our decision in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62 (1971), inferentially is to the same effect, for we there would not have indulged in statutory interpretation favorable to abortion in specified circumstances if the necessary consequence was the termination of life entitled to Fourteenth Amendment protection.

This conclusion, however, does not of itself fully answer the contentions raised by Texas, and we pass on to other considerations.

B. The pregnant woman cannot be isolated in her privacy. She carries an embryo and, later, a fetus, if by Art. 1257 of the Texas Penal Code. If the fetus is a person, may the penalties be different?

[55] Cf. the Wisconsin abortion statute, defining "unborn child" to mean "a human being from the time of conception until it is born alive," Wis. Stat. § 940.04 (6) (1969), and the new Connecticut statute, Public Act No. 1, May 1972 Special Session, declaring it to be the public policy of the State and the legislative intent "to protect and preserve human life from the moment of conception."

one accepts the medical definitions of the developing young in the human uterus. See Dorland's Illustrated Medical Dictionary, 478–479, 547 (24th ed. 1965). The situation therefore is inherently different from marital intimacy, or bedroom possession of obscene material, or marriage, or procreation, or education, with which Eisenstadt, Griswold, Stanley, Loving, Skinner, Pierce, and Meyer were respectively concerned. As we have intimated above, it is reasonable and appropriate for a State to decide that at some point in time another interest, that of health of the mother or that of potential human life, becomes significantly involved. The woman's privacy is no longer sole and any right of privacy she possesses must be measured accordingly.

Texas urges that, apart from the Fourteenth Amendment, life begins at conception and is present throughout pregnancy, and that, therefore, the State has a compelling interest in protecting that life from and after conception. We need not resolve the difficult question of when life begins. When those trained in the respective disciplines of medicine, philosophy, and theology are unable to arrive at any consensus, the judiciary, at this point in the development of man's knowledge, is not in a position to speculate as to the answer.

It should be sufficient to note briefly the wide divergence of thinking on this most sensitive and difficult question. There has always been strong support for the view that life does not begin until live birth. This was the belief of the Stoics.[56] It appears to be the predominant, though not the unanimous, attitude of the Jewish faith.[57] It may be taken to represent also the position of a large segment of the Protestant community, insofar as that can be ascertained; organized groups that have taken a formal position on the abortion issue have generally regarded abortion as a matter for the conscience of the individual and her family.[58] As we have noted, the common law found greater significance in quickening. Physicians and their scientific colleagues have regarded that event with less interest and have tended to focus either upon conception or upon live birth or upon the interim point at which the fetus becomes "viable," that is, potentially able to live outside the mother's womb, albeit with artificial aid.[59] Viability is usually placed at about seven months (28 weeks) but may occur earlier, even at 24 weeks.[60] The Aristotelian theory of "mediate animation," that held sway throughout the Middle Ages and the Renaissance in Europe, continued to be official Roman Catholic dogma until the 19th century, despite opposition to this "ensoulment" theory from those in the Church who would recognize the existence of life from the moment of conception.[61] The latter is now, of course, the official belief of the Catholic Church. As one of the briefs amicus discloses, this is a view strongly held by many non-Catholics as well, and by many physicians. Substantial problems for precise definition of this view are posed, however, by new embryological data that purport to indicate that conception is a "process" over time, rather than an event, and by new medical techniques such as menstrual extraction, the "morning-after" pill, implantation of embryos, artificial insemination, and even artificial wombs.[62]

In areas other than criminal abortion the law has been reluctant to endorse any theory that life, as we recognize it, begins before live birth or to accord legal rights to the unborn except in narrowly defined situations and except when the rights are contingent upon live birth. For example, the traditional rule of tort law had denied recovery for prenatal injuries even though the child was born alive.[63] That rule has been changed in almost every jurisdiction. In most States recovery is said to be permitted only if the fetus was viable, or at least quick, when the injuries were sustained, though few courts have squarely so held.[64] In a recent development, generally opposed by the commentators, some States permit the parents of a stillborn child to maintain an action for wrongful death because of prenatal injuries.[65] Such an action, however, would appear to be one to vindicate the parents' interest and is thus consistent with the view that the fetus, at most, represents only the potentiality of life. Similarly, unborn children have been recognized as acquiring rights or interests by way of inheritance or other devolution of property, and have been represented by guardians ad litem.[66] Perfection of the interests involved, again, has generally been contingent upon live birth. In short, the unborn have never been recognized in the law as persons in the whole sense.

In view of all this, we do not agree that, by adopting one theory of life, Texas may override the rights of the pregnant woman that are at stake. We repeat, however, that the State does have an important and legitimate interest in preserving and protecting the health of the pregnant woman, whether she be a resident of the State or a nonresident who seeks medical consultation and treatment there, and that it has still another important and legitimate interest in protecting the potentiality of human life. These interests are separate and distinct. Each grows in substantiality as the woman approaches term and, at a point during pregnancy, each becomes "compelling."

With respect to the State's important and legitimate interest in the health of the mother, the "compelling" point, in the light of present medical knowledge, is at approximately the end of the first trimester. This is so because of the now established medical fact, referred to above at p. 34, that until the end of the first trimester mortality in abortion is less than mortality in normal childbirth. It follows that, from and after this point, a State may regulate the abortion procedure to the extent that the regulation reasonably relates to the preservation and protection of maternal health. Examples of permissible state regulation in this area are requirements as to the qualifications of the person who is to perform the abortion; as to the licensure of that person; as to the facility in which the procedure is to be performed, that is, whether it must be a hospital or may be a clinic or some other place of less-than-hospital status; as to the licensing of the facility; and the like.

This means, on the other hand, that, for the period of pregnancy prior to this "compelling" point, the attending physician, in consultation with his patient, is free to determine, without regulation by the State, that in his medical judgment the patient's pregnancy should be terminated. If that decision is reached, the judgment may be effectuated by an abortion free of interference by the State.

With respect to the State's important and legitimate interest in potential life, the "compelling" point is at viability. This is so because the fetus then presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb. State regulation protective of fetal life after viability thus has both logical and biological justifications. If the State is interested in protecting fetal life after viability, it may go so far as to proscribe abortion during that period except when it is necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother.

Measured against these standards, Art. 1196 of the Texas Penal Code, in restricting legal abortions to those "procured or attempted by medical advice for the purpose of saving the life of the mother," sweeps too broadly. The statute makes no distinction between abortions performed early in pregnancy and those performed later, and it limits to a single reason, "saving" the mother's life, the legal justification for the procedure. The statute, therefore, cannot survive the constitutional attack made upon it here.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider the additional challenge to the Texas statute asserted on grounds of vagueness. See United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62, 67–72 (1971).

XI

To summarize and to repeat:

1. A state criminal abortion statute of the current Texas type, that excepts from criminality only a life saving procedure on behalf of the mother, without regard to pregnancy stage and without recognition of the other interests involved, is violative of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

(a) For the stage prior to approximately the end of the first trimester, the abortion decision and its effectuation must be left to the medical judgment of the pregnant woman's attending physician.

(b) For the stage subsequent to approximately the end of the first trimester, the State, in promoting its interest in the health of the mother, may, if it chooses, regulate the abortion procedure in ways that are reasonably related to maternal health.

(c) For the stage subsequent to viability the State, in promoting its interest in the potentiality of human life, may, if it chooses, regulate, and even proscribe, abortion except where it is necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother.

2. The State may define the term "physician," as it has been employed in the preceding numbered paragraphs of this Part XI of this opinion, to mean only a physician currently licensed by the State, and may proscribe any abortion by a person who is not a physician as so defined.

In Doe v. Bolton, post, procedural requirements contained in one of the modern abortion statutes are considered. That opinion and this one, of course, are to be read together.[67]

This holding, we feel, is consistent with the relative weights of the respective interests involved, with the lessons and example of medical and legal history, with the lenity of the common law, and with the demands of the profound problems of the present day. The decision leaves the State free to place increasing restrictions on abortion as the period of pregnancy lengthens, so long as those restrictions are tailored to the recognized state interests. The decision vindicates the right of the physician to administer medical treatment according to his professional judgment up to the points where important state interests provide compelling justifications for intervention. Up to those points the abortion decision in all its aspects is inherently, and primarily, a medical decision, and basic responsibility for it must rest with the physician. If an individual practitioner abuses the privilege of exercising proper medical judgment, the usual remedies, judicial and intra-professional, are available.

XII

Our conclusion that Art. 1196 is unconstitutional means, of course, that the Texas abortion statutes, as a unit, must fall. The exception of Art. 1196 cannot be [67] Neither in this opinion nor in Doe v. Bolton, post, do we discuss the father's rights, if any exist in the constitutional context, in the abortion decision. No paternal right has been asserted in either of the cases, and the Texas and the Georgia statutes on their face take no cognizance of the father. We are aware that some statutes recognize the father under certain circumstances. North Carolina, for example, 1B N. C. Gen. Stat. § 14–45.1 (Supp. 1971), requires written permission for the abortion from the husband when the woman is a married minor, that is, when she is less than 18 years of age, 41 N. C. A. G. 489 (1971); if the woman is an unmarried minor, written permission from the parents is required. We need not now decide whether provisions of this kind are constitutional.

stricken separately, for then the State is left with a statute proscribing all abortion procedures no matter how medically urgent the case.

Although the District Court granted plaintiff Roe declaratory relief, it stopped short of issuing an injunction against enforcement of the Texas statutes. The Court has recognized that different considerations enter into a federal court's decision as to declaratory relief, on the one hand, and injunctive relief, on the other. Zwickler v. Koota, 389 U. S. 241, 252–255 (1967); Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U. S. 479 (1965). We are not dealing with a statute that, on its face, appears to abridge free expression, an area of particular concern under Dombrowski and refined in Younger v. Harris, 401 U. S., at 50.

We find it unnecessary to decide whether the District Court erred in withholding injunctive relief, for we assume the Texas prosecutorial authorities will give full credence to this decision that the present criminal abortion statutes of that State are unconstitutional.

The judgment of the District Court as to intervenor Hallford is reversed, and Dr. Hallford's complaint in intervention is dismissed. In all other respects the judgment of the District Court is affirmed. Costs are allowed to the appellee.

It is so ordered.

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, concurring.

I agree that, under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, the abortion statutes of Georgia and Texas impermissibly limit the performance of abortions necessary to protect the health of pregnant women, using the term health in its broadest medical context. See Vuitch v. United States, 402 U. S. 62, 71–72 (1971). I am somewhat troubled that the Court has taken notice of various scientific and medical data in reaching its conclusion; however, I do not believe that the Court has exceeded the scope of judicial notice accepted in other contexts.

In oral argument, counsel for the State of Texas informed the Court that early abortive procedures were routinely permitted in certain exceptional cases, such as nonconsensual pregnancies resulting from rape and incest. In the face of a rigid and narrow statute, such as that of Texas, no one in these circumstances should be placed in a posture of dependence on a prosecutorial policy or prosecutorial discretion. Of course, States must have broad power, within the limits indicated in the opinions, to regulate the subject of abortions, but where the consequences of state intervention are so severe, uncertainty must be avoided as much as possible. For my part, I would be inclined to allow a State to require the certification of two physicians to support an abortion, but the Court holds otherwise. I do not believe that such a procedure is unduly burdensome, as are the complex steps of the Georgia statute, which require as many as six doctors and the use of a hospital certified by the JCAH.

I do not read the Court's holding today as having the sweeping consequences attributed to it by the dissenting Justices; the dissenting views discount the reality that the vast majority of physicians observe the standards of their profession, and act only on the basis of carefully deliberated medical judgments relating to life and health. Plainly, the Court today rejects any claim that the Constitution requires abortion on demand.

MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS, concurring.

While I join the opinion of the Court,[1] I add a few words.

The questions presented in the present cases go far beyond the issues of vagueness, which we considered in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62. They involve the right of privacy, one aspect of which we considered in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479, 484, when we held that various guarantees in the Bill of Rights create zones of privacy.[2]

[1] I disagree with the dismissal of Dr. Hallford's complaint in intervention in Roe v. Wade, because my disagreement with Younger v. Harris, 401 U. S. 37, revealed in my dissent in that case, still persists and extends to the progeny of that case.

[2] There is no mention of privacy in our Bill of Rights but our decisions have recognized it as one of the fundamental values those amendments were designed to protect. The fountainhead case is Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, holding that a federal statute which authorized a court in tax cases to require a taxpayer to produce his records or to concede the Government's allegations offended the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. Justice Bradley, for the Court, found that the measure unduly intruded

The Griswold case involved a law forbidding the use of contraceptives. We held that law as applied to married people unconstitutional:

> "We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system. Marriage is a coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred." Id., 486.

The District Court in Doe held that Griswold and related cases "establish a constitutional right to privacy broad enough to encompass the right of a woman to terminate an unwanted pregnancy in its early stages, by obtaining an abortion." 319 F. Supp., at 1054.

The Supreme Court of California expressed the same view in People v. Belous,[3] 71 Cal. 2d 954, 963.

into the "sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life." Id., 630. Prior to Boyd, in Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 195, Mr. Justice Miller held for the Court that neither House of Congress "possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen." Of Kilbourn Mr. Justice Field later said, "This case will stand for all time as a bulwark against the invasion of the right of the citizen to protection in his private affairs against the unlimited scrutiny of investigation by a congressional committee." In re Pacific Ry. Comm'n, 32 F. 231, 253 (cited with approval in Sinclair v. United States, 279 U. S. 263, 293). Mr. Justice Harlan, also speaking for the Court in Interstate Commerce Comm'n v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447, 478, thought the same was true of administrative inquiries, saying the Constitution did not permit a "general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen." In a similar vein were Harriman v. Interstate Commerce Comm'n, 211 U. S. 407; United States v. Louisville & Nashville R. R., 236 U. S. 318, 335; and Federal Trade Comm'n v. American Tobacco Co., 264 U. S. 298.

[3] The California abortion statute, held unconstitutional in the Belous case made it a crime to perform or help perform an abortion "unless the same is necessary to preserve [the mother's] life." 71 Cal. 2d, at 959.

The Ninth Amendment obviously does not create federally enforceable rights. It merely says, "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." But a catalogue of these rights includes customary, traditional, and time-honored rights, amenities, privileges, and immunities that come within the sweep of "the Blessings of Liberty" mentioned in the preamble to the Constitution. Many of them in my view come within the meaning of the term "liberty" as used in the Fourteenth Amendment.

First is the autonomous control over the development and expression on one's intellect, interests, tastes, and personality.

These are rights protected by the First Amendment and in my view they are absolute, permitting of no exceptions. See Terminiello v. Chicago, 337 U. S. 77; Roth v. United States, 354 U. S. 476, 508 (dissent); Kingsley Pictures Corp. v. Regents, 360 U. S. 684, 697 (concurring); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U. S. 254, 293 (Black, J., concurring in which I joined). The Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment is one facet of this constitutional right. The right to remain silent as respects one's own beliefs, Watkins v. United States, 354 U. S. 178, 196–199, is protected by the First and the Fifth. The First Amendment grants the privacy of first-class mail, United States v. Van Leeuwen, 397 U. S. 249, 253. All of these aspects of the right of privacy are "rights retained by the people" in the meaning of the Ninth Amendment.

Second is freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one's life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, and the education and upbringing of children.

These rights, unlike those protected by the First Amendment, are subject to some control by the police power. Thus the Fourth Amendment speaks only of "unreasonable searches and seizures" and of "probable cause." These rights are "fundamental" and we have held that in order to support legislative action the statute must be narrowly and precisely drawn and that a "compelling state interest" must be shown in support of the limitation. E. g., Kramer v. Union Free School Dist., 395 U. S. 621 (1969); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U. S. 618 (1969); Carrington v. Rash, 380 U. S. 89 (1965); Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U. S. 398 (1963); NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson.

The liberty to marry a person of one's own choosing, Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1; the right of procreation, Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535; the liberty to direct the education of one's children, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, and the privacy of the marital relation, Griswold v. Connecticut, supra, are in this category.[4]

[4] My Brother STEWART, writing in the present cases, says that our decision in Griswold reintroduced substantive due process that had been rejected in Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U. S. 726. Skrupa involved legislation governing a business enterprise; and the Court in that case, as had Mr. Justice Holmes on earlier occasions, rejected the idea that "liberty" within the meaning of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was a vessel to be filled with one's personal choices of values, whether drawn from the laissez faire school, from the socialistic school, or from the technocrats. Griswold involved legislation touching on the marital relation and involving the conviction of a licensed physician for giving married people information concerning contraception. There is nothing specific in the Bill of Rights that covers that item. Nor is there anything in the Bill of Rights that in terms protects the right of association or the privacy in one's association. Yet we found those rights in the periphery of the First Amendment. NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U. S. 449, 462. Other peripheral rights are the right to educate one's children as one chooses, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, and the right to study the German language. Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390. These decisions, with all respect, have nothing to do with substantive due process. One may think they

Only last Term in Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U. S. 438, another contraceptive case, we expanded the concept of Griswold by saying:

> "It is true that in Griswold the right of privacy in question inhered in the marital relationship. Yet the marital couple is not an independent entity with a mind and heart of its own, but an association of two individuals each with a separate intellectual and emotional makeup. If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted government intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child."

This right of privacy was called by Mr. Justice Brandeis the right "to be let alone." Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438, 478. That right includes the privilege of an individual to plan his own affairs, for, "outside of areas of plainly harmful conduct, every American is left to shape his own life as he thinks best, do what he pleases, go where he pleases." Kent v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116, 126.

Third is the freedom to care for one's health and person, freedom from bodily restraint or compulsion, freedom to walk, stroll, or loaf.

are not peripheral rights to other rights that are expressed in the Bill of Rights. But that is not enough to bring into play the protection of substantive due process.

There are of course those who have believed that the reach of due process in the Fourteenth Amendment included all of the Bill of Rights but went further. Such was the view of Mr. Justice Murphy and Mr. Justice Rutledge. See Adamson v. California, 332 U. S. 46, 123, 124 (dissenting). Perhaps they were right; but it is a bridge that neither I nor those who joined the Court opinion in Griswold crossed.

These rights, though fundamental, are likewise subject to regulation on a showing of "compelling state interest." We stated in Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U. S. 156, 164, that walking, strolling, and wandering "are historically part of the amenities of life as we have known them." As stated in Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 29:

> "There is, of course, a sphere within which the individual may assert the supremacy of his own will and rightfully dispute the authority of any human government, especially of any free government existing under a written constitution, to interfere with the exercise of that will."

In Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 252, the Court said,

> "The inviolability of the person is as much invaded by a compulsory stripping and exposure as by a blow."

In Terry v. Ohio, 392 U. S. 1, 8–9, the Court in speaking of the Fourth Amendment stated

> "This inestimable right of personal security belongs as much to the citizen on the streets of our cities as to the Governor closeted in his study to dispose of his secret affairs."

Katz v. United States, 389 U. S. 347, 350, emphasizes that the Fourth Amendment

> "protects individual privacy against certain kinds of governmental intrusion."

In Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399, the Court said:

> "Without doubt, it [liberty] denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized at common law as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men."

The Georgia statute is at war with the clear message of these cases—that a woman is free to make the basic decision whether to bear an unwanted child. Elaborate argument is hardly necessary to demonstrate that child birth may deprive a woman of her preferred life stye and force upon her a radically different and undesired future. For example, rejected applicants under the Georgia statute are required to endure the discomforts of pregnancy; to incur the pain, higher mortality rate, and aftereffects of childbirth; to abandon educational plans; to sustain loss of income; to forgo the satisfactions of careers; to tax further mental and physical health in providing childcare; and, in some cases, to bear the lifelong stigma of unwed motherhood, a badge which may haunt, if not deter, later legitimate family relationships.

Such a holding is, however, only the beginning of the problem. The State has interests to protect. Vaccinations to prevent epidemics are one example, as Jacobson holds. The Court held that compulsory sterilization of imbeciles afflicted with hereditary forms of insanity or imbecility is another. Buck v. Bell, 274 U. S. 200. Abortion affects another. While childbirth endangers the lives of some women, voluntary abortion at any time and place regardless of medical standards would impinge on a rightful concern of society. The woman's health is part of that concern; as is the life of the fetus after quickening. These concerns justify the State in treating the procedure as a medical one.

One difficulty is that this statute as construed and applied apparently does not give full sweep to the "psychological as well as physical well-being" of women patients which saved the concept "health" from being void for vagueness in United States v. Vuitch, supra, at 72. But apart from that, Georgia's enactment has a constitutional infirmity because, as stated by the District Court, it "limits the number of reasons for which an abortion may be sought." I agree with the holding of the District Court, "This the State may not do, because such action unduly restricts a decision sheltered by the Constitutional right to privacy." 319 F. Supp., at 1056.

The vicissitudes of life produce pregnancies which may be unwanted, or which may impair "health" in the broad Vuitch sense of the term, or which may imperil the life of the mother, or which in the full setting of the case may create such suffering, disclocations, misery, or tragedy as to make an early abortion the only civilized step to take. These hardships may be properly embraced in the "health" factor of the mother as appraised by a person of insight. Or they may be part of a broader medical judgment based on what is "appropriate" in a given case, though perhaps not "necessary" in a strict sense.

The "liberty" of the mother, though rooted as it is in the Constitution, may be qualified by the State for the reasons we have stated. But where fundamental personal rights and liberties are involved, the corrective legislation must be "narrowly drawn to prevent the supposed evil," Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U. S. 296, 307, and not be dealt with in an "unlimited and indiscriminate" manner. Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U. S. 479, 490. And see Talley v. California, 362 U. S. 60. Unless regulatory measures are so confined and are addressed to the specific areas of compelling legislative concern, the police power would become the great leveller of constitutional rights and liberties.

There is no doubt that the State may require abortions to be performed by qualified medical personnel. The legitimate objective of preserving the mother's health clearly supports such laws. Their impact upon the woman's privacy is minimal. But the Georgia statute outlaws virtually all such operations—even in the earliest stages of pregnancy. In light of modern medican evidence suggesting that an early abortion is safer healthwise than childbirth itself,[5] it cannot be seriously urged that so comprehensive a ban is aimed at protecting the woman's health. Rather, this expansive proscription of all abortions along the temporal spectrum can rest only on a public goal of preserving both embryonic and fetal life.

The present statute has struck the balance between the woman and the State's interests wholly in favor of the latter. I am not prepared to hold that a State may equate, as Georgia has done, all phases of maturation preceding birth. We held in Griswold that the States may not preclude spouses from attempting to avoid the joinder of sperm and egg. If this is true, it is difficult to perceive any overriding public necessity

[5] Many studies show that it is safer for a woman to have a medically induced abortion than to bear a child. In the first 11 months of operation of the New York abortion law, the mortality rate associated with such operations was six per 100,000 operations. Abortion Mortality, 20 Morbidity and Mortality 208, 209 (1971) (U. S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Public Health Service). On the other hand, the maternal mortality rate associated with childbirths other than abortions was 18 per 100,000 live births. Tietze, Mortality with Contraception and Induced Abortion, 45 Studies in Family Planning 6 (1969). See also C. Tietze & H. Lehfeldt, Legal Abortion in Eastern Europe 175 J. A. M. A. 1149, 1152 (1961); V. Kolblova, Legal Abortion in Czechoslovakia, 196 J. A. M. A. 371 (1966); Mehland, Combating Illegal Abortion in the Socialist Countries of Europe, 13 World Med. J. 84 (1966).

which might attach precisely at the moment of conception. As Mr. Justice Clark has said: [6]

> "To say that life is present at conception is to give recognition to the potential, rather than the actual. The unfertilized egg has life, and if fertilized, it takes on human proportions. But the law deals in reality, not obscurity—the known rather than the unknown. When sperm meets egg, life may eventually form, but quite often it does not. The law does not deal in speculation. The phenomenon of life takes time to develop, and until it is actually present, it cannot be destroyed. Its interruption prior to formation would hardly be homicide, and as we have seen, society does not regard it as such. The rites of Baptism are not performed and death certificates are not required when a miscarriage occurs. No prosecutor has ever returned a murder indictment charging the taking of the life of a fetus.[7] This would not be the case if the fetus constituted human life."

In summary, the enactment is overbroad. It is not closely correlated to the aim of preserving pre-natal life. In fact, it permits its destruction in several cases, including pregnancies resulting from sex acts in which unmarried females are below the statutory age of consent. At the same time, however, the measure broadly proscribes aborting other pregnancies which may cause severe

[7] In Keeler v. Superior Court, 2 Cal. 3d 619, 470 P. 2d 617, the California Supreme Court held in 1970 that the California murder statute did not cover the killing of an unborn fetus, even though the fetus be "viable" and that it was beyond judicial power to extend the statute to the killing of an unborn. It held that the child must be "born alive before a charge of homicide can be sustained." 2 Cal. 3d, at 639.

mental disorders. Additionally, the statute is overbroad because it equates the value of embryonic life immediately after conception with the worth of life immediately before birth.

III

Under the Georgia Act the mother's physician is not the sole judge as to whether the abortion should be performed. Two other licensed physicians must concur in his judgment.[8] Moreover, the abortion must be performed in a licensed hospital;[9] and the abortion must be approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of that hospital.[10]

Physicians, who speak to us in Doe through an amicus brief, complain of the Georgia Act's interference with their practice of their profession.

The right of privacy has no more conspicuous place than in the physician-patient relationship, unless it be in the priest-penitent relation.

It is one thing for a patient to agree that her physician may consult with another physician about her case. It is quite a different matter for the State compulsorily to impose on that physician-patient relationship another layer or, as in this case, still a third layer of physicians. The right of privacy—the right to care for one's health and person and to seek out a physician of one's own choice protected by the Fourteenth Amendment—becomes only a matter of theory not a reality, when a multiple physician approval system is mandated by the State.

The State licenses a physician. If he is derelict or faithless, the procedures available to punish him or to deprive him of his license are well known. He is entitled to procedural due process before professional disciplinary sanctions may be imposed. See In re Ruffalo, 390 U. S. 544. Crucial here, however, is state-imposed control over the medical decision whether pregnancy should be interrupted. The good-faith decision of the patient's chosen physician is overridden and the final decision passed on to others in whose selection the patient has no part. This is a total destruction of the right of privacy between physician and patient and the intimacy of relation which that entails.

The right to seek advice on one's health and the right to place his reliance on the physician of his choice are basic to Fourteenth Amendment values. We deal with fundamental rights and liberties, which, as already noted, can be contained or controlled only by discretely drawn legislation that preserves the "liberty" and regulates only those phases of the problem of compelling legislative concern. The imposition by the State of group controls over the physician-patient relation is not made on any medical procedure apart from abortion, no matter how dangerous the medical step may be. The oversight imposed on the physician and patient in abortion cases denies them their "liberty," viz., their right of privacy, without any compelling, discernable state interest.

Georgia has constitutional warrant in treating abortion as a medical problem. To protect the woman's right of privacy, however, the control must be through the physician of her choice and the standards set for his performance.

The protection of the fetus when it has acquired life is a legitimate concern of the State. Georgia's law makes no rational, discernible decision on that score.[11] For under the Act the developmental stage of the fetus is irrelevant when pregnancy is the result of rape or when the fetus will very likely be born with a permanent defect or when a continuation of the pregnancy will endanger the life of the mother or permanently injure her health. When life is present is a question we do not try to resolve. While basically a question for medical experts, as stated by Mr. Justice Clark,[12] it is, of course, caught up in matters of religion and morality.

In short, I agree with the Court that endangering the life of the woman or seriously and permanently injuring her health are standards too narrow for the right of privacy that are at stake.

I also agree that the superstructure of medical supervision which Georgia has erected violates the patient's right of privacy inherent in her choice of her own physician.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 70–18

Jane Roe et al., Appellants, v. Henry Wade. | On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas.

[January 22, 1973]

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, concurring.

In 1963, this Court, in Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U. S. 726, purported to sound the death knell for the doctrine of substantive due process, a doctrine under which many state laws had in the past been held to violate the Fourteenth Amendment. As Mr. Justice Black's opinion for the Court in Skrupa put it: "We have returned to the original constitutional proposition that courts do not substitute their social and economic beliefs for the judgment of legislative bodies, who are elected to pass laws." Id., at 730.[1]

Barely two years later, in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479, the Court held a Connecticut birth control law unconstitutional. In view of what had been so recently said in Skrupa, the Court's opinion in Griswold understandably did its best to avoid reliance on the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment as the ground for decision. Yet, the Connecticut law did not violate any provision of the Bill of Rights, nor any other specific provision of the Constitution.[2] So it was clear

[1] Only Mr. Justice Harlan failed to join the Court's opinion, 372 U. S., at 733.

[2] There is no constitutional right of privacy, as such. "[The Fourth] Amendment protects individual privacy against certain kinds of governmental intrusion, but its protections go further, and often have nothing to do with privacy at all. Other provisions of to me then, and it is equally clear to me now, that the Griswold decision can be rationally understood only as a holding that the Connecticut statute substantively invaded the "liberty" that is protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[3] As so understood, Griswold stands as one in a long line of pre-Skrupa cases decided under the doctrine of substantive due process, and I now accept it as such.

"In a Constitution for a free people, there can be no doubt that the meaning of 'liberty' must be broad indeed." Board of Regents v. Roth, 408 U. S. 564, 572. The Constitution nowhere mentions a specific right of personal choice in matters of marriage and family life, but the "liberty" protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment covers more than those freedoms explicitly named in the Bill of Rights. See Schware v. Board of Bar Examiners, 353 U. S. 232, 238–239; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510, 534–535; Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390, 399–400. Cf. Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U. S. 618, 629–630; United States v. Guest, 383 U. S. 745, 757–758; Carrington v. Rash, 380 U. S. 89, 96; Aptheker v. Secretary of State, 378 U. S. 500, 505; Kent v. Dulles, 357 U. S. 116, 127; Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U. S. 497, 499–500; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 41.

the Constitution protect personal privacy from other forms of governmental invasion. But the protection of a person's general right to privacy—his right to be let alone by other people—is, like the protection of his property and of his very life, left largely to the law of the individual States." Katz v. United States, 389 U. S. 347, 350–351 (footnotes omitted).

[3] This was also clear to Mr. Justice Black, 381 U. S., at 507 (dissenting opinion); to Mr. Justice Harlan, 381 U. S., at 499 (opinion concurring in the judgment); and to MR. JUSTICE WHITE, 381 U. S., at 502 (opinion concurring in the judgment). See also Mr. Justice Harlan's thorough and thoughtful opinion dissenting from dismissal of the appeal in Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497, 522.

As Mr. Justice Harlan once wrote: "[T]he full scope of the liberty guaranteed by the Due Process Clause cannot be found in or limited by the precise terms of the specific guarantees elsewhere provided in the Constitution. This 'liberty' is not a series of isolated points pricked out in terms of the taking of property; the freedom of speech, press, and religion; the right to keep and bear arms; the freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures; and so on. It is a rational continuum which, broadly speaking, includes a freedom from all substantial arbitrary impositions and purposeless restraints, . . . and which also recognizes, what a reasonable and sensitive judgment must, that certain interests require particularly careful scrutiny of the state needs asserted to justify their abridgment." Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497, 543 (opinion dissenting from dismissal of appeal) (citations omitted). In the words of Mr. Justice Frankfurter, "Great concepts like . . . 'liberty' . . . were purposely left to gather meaning from experience. For they relate to the whole domain of social and economic fact, and the statesmen who founded this Nation knew too well that only a stagnant society remains unchanged." National Mutual Ins. Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co., Inc., 337 U. S. 582, 646 (dissenting opinion).

Several decisions of this Court make clear that freedom of personal choice in matters of marriage and family life is one of the liberties protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Loving v. Virginia, 388 U. S. 1, 12; Griswold v. Connecticut, supra; Pierce v. Society of Sisters, supra; Meyer v. Nebraska, supra. See also Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U. S. 158, 166; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535, 541. As recently as last Term, in Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U. S. 438, 453, we recognized "the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child." That right necessarily includes the right of a woman to decide whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. "Certainly the interests of a woman in giving of her physical and emotional self during pregnancy and the interests that will be affected throughout her life by the birth and raising of a child are of a far greater degree of significance and personal intimacy than the right to send a child to private school protected in Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925), or the right to teach a foreign language protected in Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U. S. 390 (1923)." Abele v. Markle, — F. Supp. —, — (Conn. 1972).

Clearly, therefore, the Court today is correct in holding that the right asserted by Jane Roe is embraced within the personal liberty protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

It is evident that the Texas abortion statute infringes that right directly. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine a more complete abridgment of a constitutional freedom than that worked by the inflexible criminal statute now in force in Texas. The question then becomes whether the state interests advanced to justify this abridgment can survive the "particularly careful scrutiny" that the Fourteenth Amendment here requires.

The asserted state interests are protection of the health and safety of the pregnant woman, and protection of the potential future human life within her. These are legitimate objectives, amply sufficient to permit a State to regulate abortions as it does other surgical procedures, and perhaps sufficient to permit a State to regulate abortions more stringently or even to prohibit them in the late stages of pregnancy. But such legislation is not before us, and I think the Court today has thoroughly demonstrated that these state interests cannot constitutionally support the broad abridgment of personal liberty worked by the existing Texas law. Accordingly, I join the Court's opinion holding that that law is invalid under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

Nos. 70–18 AND 70–40

Jane Roe et al., Appellants, 70–18 v. Henry Wade.	On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas.
Mary Doe et al., Appellants, 70–40 v. Arthur K. Bolton, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia, et al.	On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia.

[January 22, 1973]

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST joins, dissenting.

At the heart of the controversy in these cases are those recurring pregnancies that pose no danger whatsoever to the life or health of the mother but are nevertheless unwanted for any one or more of a variety of reasons—convenience, family planning, economics, dislike of children, the embarrassment of illegitimacy, etc. The common claim before us is that for any one of such reasons, or for no reason at all, and without asserting or claiming any threat to life or health, any woman is entitled to an abortion at her request if she is able to find a medical advisor willing to undertake the procedure.

The Court for the most part sustains this position: During the period prior to the time the fetus becomes viable, the Constitution of the United States values the convenience, whim or caprice of the putative mother more than the life or potential life of the fetus; the Constitution, therefore, guarantees the right to an abortion as against any state law or policy seeking to protect the fetus from an abortion not prompted by more compelling reasons of the mother.

With all due respect, I dissent. I find nothing in the language or history of the Constitution to support the Court's judgment. The Court simply fashions and announces a new constitutional right for pregnant mothers and, with scarcely any reason or authority for its action, invests that right with sufficient substance to override most existing state abortion statutes. The upshot is that the people and the legislatures of the 50 States are constitutionally disentitled to weigh the relative importance of the continued existence and development of the fetus on the one hand against a spectrum of possible impacts on the mother on the other hand. As an exercise of raw judicial power, the Court perhaps has authority to do what it does today; but in my view its judgment is an improvident and extravagant exercise of the power of judicial review which the Constitution extends to this Court.

The Court apparently values the convenience of the pregnant mother more than the continued existence and development of the life or potential life which she carries. Whether or not I might agree with that marshalling of values, I can in no event join the Court's judgment because I find no constitutional warrant for imposing such an order of priorities on the people and legislatures of the States. In a sensitive area such as this, involving as it does issues over which reasonable men may easily and heatedly differ, I cannot accept the Court's exercise of its clear power of choice by interposing a constitutional barrier to state efforts to protect human life and by investing mothers and doctors with the constitutionally protected right to exterminate it. This issue, for the most part, should be left with the people and to the political processes the people have devised to govern their affairs.

It is my view, therefore, that the Texas statute is not constitutionally infirm because it denies abortions to those who seek to serve only their convenience rather than to protect their life or health. Nor is this plaintiff, who claims no threat to her mental or physical health, entitled to assert the possible rights of those women whose pregnancy assertedly implicates their health. This, together with United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62 (1971), dictates reversal of the judgment of the District Court.

Likewise, because Georgia may constitutionally forbid abortions to putative mothers who, like the plaintiff in this case, do not fall within the reach of § 26–1202 (a) of its criminal code, I have no occasion, and the District Court had none, to consider the constitutionality of the procedural requirements of the Georgia statute as applied to those pregnancies posing substantial hazards to either life or health. I would reverse the judgment of the District Court in the Georgia case.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 70–18

Jane Roe et al., Appellants,
v.
Henry Wade.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas.

[January 22, 1973]

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The Court's opinion brings to the decision of this troubling question both extensive historical fact and a wealth of legal scholarship. While its opinion thus commands my respect, I find myself nonetheless in fundamental disagreement with those parts of it which invalidate the Texas statute in question, and therefore dissent.

I

The Court's opinion decides that a State may impose virtually no restriction on the performance of abortions during the first trimester of pregnancy. Our previous decisions indicate that a necessary predicate for such an opinion is a plaintiff who was in her first trimester of pregnancy at some time during the pendency of her law suit. While a party may vindicate his own constitutional rights, he may not seek vindication for the rights of others. Moose Lodge v. Irvis, 407 U. S. 163 (1972); Sierra Club v. Morton, 405 U. S. 727 (1972). The Court's statement of facts in this case makes clear, however, that the record in no way indicates the presence of such a plaintiff. We know only that plaintiff Roe at the time of filing her complaint was a pregnant woman; for aught that appears in this record, she may have been in her last trimester of pregnancy as of the date the complaint was filed.

Nothing in the Court's opinion indicates that Texas might not constitutionally apply its proscription of abortion as written to a woman in that stage of pregnancy. Nonetheless, the Court uses her complaint against the Texas statute as a fulcrum for deciding that States may impose virtually no restrictions on medical abortions performed during the first trimester of pregnancy. In deciding such a hypothetical lawsuit the Court departs from the longstanding admonition that it should never "formulate a rule of constitutional law broader than is required by the precise facts to which it is to be applied." Liverpool, New York and Philadelphia Steamship Co. v. Commissioners of Emigration, 113 U. S. 33, 39 (1885). See also Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U. S. 288, 345 (1936) (Brandeis, concurring).

II

Even if there were a plaintiff in this case capable of litigating the issue which the Court decides, I would reach a conclusion opposite to that reached by the Court. I have difficulty in concluding, as the Court does, that the right of "privacy" is involved in this case. Texas by the statute here challenged bars the performance of a medical abortion by a licensed physician on a plaintiff such as Roe. A transaction resulting in an operation such as this is not "private" in the ordinary usage of that word. Nor is the "privacy" which the Court finds here even a distant relative of the freedom from searches and seizures protected by the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution which the Court has referred to as embodying a right to privacy. Katz v. United States, 389 U. S. 347 (1967).

If the Court means by the term "privacy" no more than that the claim of a person to be free from unwanted state regulation of consensual transactions may be a form of "liberty" protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, there is no doubt that similar claims have been upheld in our earlier decisions on the basis of that liberty. I agree with the statement of MR. JUSTICE STEWART in his concurring opinion that the "liberty," against deprivation of which without due process the Fourteenth Amendment protects, embraces more than the rights found in the Bill of Rights. But that liberty is not guaranteed absolutely against deprivation, but only against deprivation without due process of law. The test traditionally applied in the area of social and economic legislation is whether or not a law such as that challenged has a rational relation to a valid state objective. Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U. S. 483, 491 (1955). The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment undoubtedly does place a limit on legislative power to enact laws such as this, albeit a broad one. If the Texas statute were to prohibit an abortion even where the mother's life is in jeopardy, I have little doubt that such a statute would lack a rational relation to a valid state objective under the test stated in Williamson, supra. But the Court's sweeping invalidation of any restrictions on abortion during the first trimester is impossible to justify under that standard, and the conscious weighing of competing factors which the Court's opinion apparently substitutes for the established test is far more appropriate to a legislative judgment than to a judicial one.

The Court eschews the history of the Fourteenth Amendment in its reliance on the "compelling state interest" test. See Weber v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 406 U. S. 164, 179 (1972) (dissenting opinion). But the Court adds a new wrinkle to this test by transposing it from the legal considerations associated with the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to this case arising under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Unless I misapprehend the consequences of this transplanting of the "compelling state interest test," the Court's opinion will accomplish the seemingly impossible feat of leaving this area of the law more confused than it found it.

While the Court's opinion quotes from the dissent of Mr. Justice Holmes in Lochner v. New York, 198 U. S. 45 (1905), the result it reaches is more closely attuned to the majority opinion of Mr. Justice Peckham in that case. As in Lochner and similar cases applying substantive due process standards to economic and social welfare legislation, the adoption of the compelling state interest standard will inevitably require this Court to examine the legislative policies and pass on the wisdom of these policies in the very process of deciding whether a particular state interest put forward may or may not be "compelling." The decision here to break the term of pregnancy into three distinct terms and to outline the permissible retrictions the State may impose in each one, for example, partakes more of judicial legislation than it does of a determination of the intent of the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The fact that a majority of the States, reflecting after all the majority sentiment in those States, have had restrictions on abortions for at least a century seems to me as strong an indication there is that the asserted right to an abortion is not "so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental," Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U. S. 97, 105 (1934). Even today, when society's views on abortion are changing, the very existence of the debate is evidence that the "right" to an abortion is not so universally accepted as the appellants would have us believe.

To reach its result the Court necessarily has had to find within the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment a right that was apparently completely unknown to the drafters of the Amendment. As early as 1821, the first state law dealing directly with abortion was enacted by the Connecticut legislature. Conn. Stat. Tit. 22, §§ 14, 16 (1821). By the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868 there were at least 36 laws enacted by state or territorial legislatures limiting abortion.[1] While many States have amended or updated their laws, 21 of the laws on the books in 1868 remain

There apparently was no question concerning the validity of this provision or of any of the other state statutes when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. The only conclusion possible from this history is that the drafters did not intend to have the Fourteenth Amendment withdraw from the States the power to legislate with respect to this matter.

III

Even if one were to agree that the case which the Court decides were here, and that the enunciation of the substantive constitutional law in the Court's opinion were proper, the actual disposition of the case by the Court is still difficult to justify. The Texas statute is struck down in toto, even though the Court apparently concedes that at later periods of pregnancy Texas might impose these selfsame statutory limitations on abortion. My understanding of past practice is that a statute found to be invalid as applied to a particular plaintiff, but not unconstitutional as a whole, is not simply "struck down" but is instead declared unconstitutional as applied to the fact situation before the Court. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886); Street v. New York, 394 U. S. 576 (1969).

For all of the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent.

DOE ET AL. v. BOLTON, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF GEORGIA, ET AL.

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA

No. 70–40. Argued December 13, 1971—Reargued October 11, 1972—Decided January 22, 1973

Georgia law proscribes an abortion except as performed by a duly licensed Georgia physician when necessary in "his best clinical judgment" because continued pregnancy would endanger a pregnant woman's life or injure her health; the fetus would likely be born with serious defects; or the pregnancy resulted from rape. § 26–1202 (a) of Ga. Criminal Code. In addition to a requirement that the patient be a Georgia resident and certain other requirements, the statutory scheme poses three procedural conditions in § 26–1202 (b): (1) that the abortion be performed in a hospital accredited by the Joint Committee on Accreditation of Hospitals (JCAH); (2) that the procedure be approved by the hospital staff abortion committee; and (3) that the performing physician's judgment be confirmed by independent examinations of the patient by two other licensed physicians. Appellant Doe, an indigent married Georgia citizen, who was denied an abortion after eight weeks of pregnancy for failure to meet any of the § 26–1202 (a) conditions, sought declaratory and injunctive relief, contending that the Georgia laws were unconstitutional. Others joining in the complaint included Georgia-licensed physicians (who claimed that the Georgia statutes "chilled and deterred" their practices), registered nurses, clergymen, and social workers. Though holding that all the plaintiffs had standing, the District Court ruled that only Doe presented a justiciable controversy. In Doe's case the court gave declaratory, but not injunctive, relief, invalidating as an infringement of privacy and personal liberty the limitation to the three situations specified in § 26–1202 (a) and certain other provisions but holding that the State's interest in health protection and the existence of a "potential of independent human existence" justified regulation through § 26–1202 (b) of the "manner of performance as well as the quality of the final decision to abort." The appellants, claiming entitlement to broader relief, directly appealed to this Court. Held:

1. Doe's case presents a live, justiciable controversy and she has standing to sue, Roe v. Wade, ante, p. —, as do the physician-appellants (who, unlike the physician in Wade, were not charged with abortion violations), and it is therefore unnecessary to resolve the issue of the other appellants' standing. Pp. 7–9.

2. A woman's constitutional right to an abortion is not absolute. Roe v. Wade, supra. P. 9.

3. The requirement that a physician's decision to perform an abortion must rest upon "his best clinical judgment" of its necessity is not unconstitutionally vague, since that judgment may be made in the light of all the attendant circumstances. United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62, 71–72. Pp. 10–12.

4. The three procedural conditions in § 26–1202 (b) violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Pp. 12–19.

(a) The JCAH accreditation requirement is invalid, since the State has not shown that only hospitals (let alone those with JCAH accreditation) meet its interest in fully protecting the patient; and a hospital requirement failing to exclude the first trimester of pregnancy would be invalid on that ground alone, see Roe v. Wade, supra. Pp. 12–15.

(b) The interposition of a hospital committee on abortion, a procedure not applicable as a matter of state criminal law to other surgical situations, is unduly restrictive of the patient's rights, which are already safeguarded by her personal physician. Pp. 15–17.

(c) Required acquiescence by two co-practitioners also has no rational connection with a patient's needs and unduly infringes on her physician's right to practice. Pp. 17–19.

5. The Georgia residence requirement violates the Privileges and Immunities Clause by denying protection to persons who enter Georgia for medical services there. Pp. 19–20.

6. Appellants' equal protection argument centering on the three procedural conditions in § 26–1202 (b), invalidated on other grounds, is without merit. P. 20.

7. No ruling is made on the question of injunctive relief. Cf. Roe v. Wade, supra. P. 20.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 70–40

Mary Doe et al., Appellants,
v.
Arthur K. Bolton, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia, et al.

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia.

[January 22, 1973]

MR. JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this appeal the criminal abortion statutes recently enacted in Georgia are challenged on constitutional grounds. The statutes are §§ 26–1201 through 26–1203 of the State's Criminal Code, formulated by Georgia Laws, 1968 Session, 1249, 1277–1280. In Roe v. Wade, ante —, we today have struck down, as constitutionally defective, the Texas criminal abortion statutes that are representative of provisions long in effect in a majority of our States. The Georgia legislation, however, is different and merits separate consideration.

I

The statutes in question are reproduced as Appendix A, post —.[1] As the appellants acknowledge,[2] the 1968 statutes are patterned upon the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code, § 230.3 (Proposed Official Draft, 1962), reproduced as Appendix B, post —. The ALI proposal has served as the model for recent legislation in approximately one-fourth of our States.[3] The new Georgia provisions replaced statutory law that had been in effect for more than 90 years. Georgia Laws 1876, No. 130, § 2, at 113.[4] The predecessor statute paralleled the Texas legislation considered in Roe v. Wade, ante, and made all abortions criminal except those necessary "to preserve the life" of the pregnant woman. The new statutes have not been tested on constitutional grounds in the Georgia state courts.

Section 26–1201, with a referenced exception, makes abortion a crime, and § 26–1203 provides that a person convicted of that crime shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years. Sec-

[4] The active provisions of the 1876 statute were:

"Section I. Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this Act, the wilful killing of an unborn child, so far developed as to be ordinarily called 'quick,' by any injury to the mother of such child, which would be murder if it resulted in the death of such mother, shall be guilty of a felony, and punishable by death or imprisonment for life, as the jury trying the case may recommend.

"Sec. II. Be it further enacted, That every person who shall administer to any woman pregnant with a child, any medicine, drug, or substance whatever, or shall use or employ any instrument or other means, with intent thereby to destroy such child, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such mother, or shall have been advised by two physicians to be necessary for such purpose, shall, in case the death of such child or mother be thereby produced, be declared guilty of an assault with intent to murder.

"Sec. III. Be it further enacted, That any person who shall wilfully administer to any pregnant woman any medicine, drug or substance, or anything whatever, or shall employ any instrument or means whatever, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage or abortion of any such woman, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such woman, or shall have been advised by two physicians to be necessary for that purpose, shall, upon conviction, be punished as prescribed in section 4310 of the Revised Code of Georgia."

It should be noted that the second section, in contrast to the first, makes no specific reference to quickening. The section was construed, however, to possess this line of demarcation. Taylor v. State, 105 Ga. 846, 33 S. E. 190 (1899).

tion 26–1202 (a) states the exception and removes from § 1201's definition of criminal abortion, and thus makes noncriminal, an abortion "performed by a physician duly licensed" in Georgia when, "based upon his best clinical judgment . . . an abortion is necessary because

> "(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health, or
>
> "(2) The fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect, or
> "(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape." [5]

Section 26–1202 also requires, by numbered subdivisions of its subsection (b), that, for an abortion to be authorized or performed as a noncriminal procedure, additional conditions must be fulfilled. These are (1) and (2) residence of the woman in Georgia; (3) reduction to writing of the performing physician's medical judgment that an abortion is justified for one or more of the reasons specified by § 26–1202 (a), with written concurrence in that judgment by at least two other Georgia-licensed physicians, based upon their separate personal medical examinations of the woman; (4) performance of the abortion in a hospital licensed by the State Board of Health and also accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals; (5) advance approval by an abortion committee of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; (6) certifications in a rape situation; and (7), (8), and (9) maintenance and confidentiality of records. There is a provision (subsection (c)) for judi-

[5] In contrast with the ALI model, the Georgia statute makes no specific reference to pregnancy resulting from incest. We were assured by the State at reargument that this was because the statute's reference to "rape" was intended to include incest. Tr. of Rearg. 32.

cial determination of the legality of a proposed abortion on petition of the judicial circuit law officer or of a close relative, as therein defined, of the unborn child, and for expeditious hearing of that petition. There is also a provision (subsection (e)) giving a hospital the right not to admit an abortion patient and giving any physician and any hospital employee or staff member the right, on moral or religious grounds, not to participate in the procedure.

II

On April 16, 1970, Mary Doe,[6] 23 other individuals (nine described as Georgia-licensed physicians, seven as nurses registered in the State, five as clergymen, and two as social workers), and two nonprofit Georgia corporations that advocate abortion reform, instituted this federal action in the Northern District of Georgia against the State's attorney general, the district attorney of Fulton County, and the chief of police of the city of Atlanta. The plaintiffs sought a declaratory judgment that the Georgia abortion statutes were unconstitutional in their entirety. They also sought injunctive relief restraining the defendants and their successors from enforcing the statutes.

Mary Doe alleged:

> "(1) She was a 22-year-old Georgia citizen, married, and nine weeks pregnant. She had three living children. The two older ones had been placed in a foster home because of Doe's poverty and inability to care for them. The youngest, born July 19, 1969, had been placed for adoption. Her husband had recently abandoned her and she was forced to live with her indigent parents and their eight children. She and her husband, however, had become reconciled. He was a construction worker employed only sporadically. She had been a mental patient at the State Hospital. She had been advised that an abortion could be performed on her with less danger to her health than if she gave birth to the child she was carrying. She would be unable to care for or support the new child.

"(2) On March 25, 1970, she applied to the Abortion Committee of Grady Memorial Hospital, Atlanta, for a therapeutic abortion under § 26–1202. Her application was denied 16 days later, on April 10, when she was eight weeks pregnant, on the ground that her situation was not one described in § 26–1202 (a).[7]

"(3) Because her application was denied, she was forced either to relinquish 'her right to decide when and how many children she will bear' or to seek an abortion that was illegal under the Georgia statutes. This invaded her rights of privacy and liberty in matters related to family, marriage, and sex, and deprived her of the right to choose whether to bear children. This was a violation of rights guaranteed her by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The statutes also denied her equal protection and procedural due process and, because they were unconstitutionally vague, deterred hospitals and doctors from performing abortions. She sued 'on her own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated.' "

The other plaintiffs alleged that the Georgia statutes "chilled and deterred" them from practicing their respective professions and deprived them of rights guaranteed

[7] In answers to interrogatories Doe stated that her application for an abortion was approved at Georgia Baptist Hospital on May 5, 1970, but that she was not approved as a charity patient there and had no money to pay for an abortion. Appendix 64.

by the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments. These plaintiffs also purported to sue on their own behalf and on behalf of others similarly situated.

A three-judge district court was convened. An offer of proof as to Doe's identity was made, but the court deemed it unnecessary to receive that proof. The case was then tried on the pleadings and interrogatories.

The District Court, per curiam, 319 F. Supp. 1048 (ND Ga. 1970), held that all the plaintiffs had standing but that only Doe presented a justiciable controversy. On the merits, the court concluded that the limitation in the Georgia statute of the "number of reasons for which an abortion may be sought," id., at 1056, improperly restricted Doe's rights of privacy articulated in Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S. 479 (1965), and of "personal liberty," both of which it thought "broad enough to include the decision to abort a pregnancy," id., at 1055. As a consequence, the court held invalid those portions of §§ 26–1202 (a) and (b)(3) limiting legal abortions to the three situations specified; § 26–1202 (b)(6) relating to certifications in a rape situation; and § 26–1202 (c) authorizing a court test. Declaratory relief was granted accordingly. The court, however, held that Georgia's interest in protection of health, and the existence of a "potential of independent human existence" (emphasis in original), id., at 1055, justified state regulation of "the manner of performance as well as the quality of the final decision to abort," id., at 1056, and it refused to strike down the other provisions of the statutes. It denied the request for an injunction, id., at 1057.

Claiming that they were entitled to an injunction and to broader relief, the plaintiffs took a direct appeal pursuant to 28 U. S. C. § 1253. We postponed decision on jurisdiction to the hearing on the merits. 402 U. S. 941 (1971). The defendants also purported to appeal, pursuant to § 1253, but their appeal was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. 402 U. S. 936 (1971). We are advised by the defendant-appellees, Brief 42, that an alternative appeal on their part is pending in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. The extent, therefore, to which the District Court decision was adverse to the defendants, that is, the extent to which portions of the Georgia statutes were held to be unconstitutional, technically is not now before us.[8] Swarb v. Lennox, 405 U. S. 191, 201 (1972).

III

Our decision in Roe v. Wade, ante —, establishes (1) that, despite her pseudonym, we may accept as true, for this case, Mary Doe's existence and her pregnant state on April 16, 1970; (2) that the constitutional issue is substantial; (3) that the interim termination of Doe's and all other Georgia pregnancies in existence in 1970 has not rendered the case moot; and (4) that Doe presents a justiciable controversy and has standing to maintain the action.

Inasmuch as Doe and her class are recognized, the question whether the other appellants—physicians, nurses, clergymen, social workers, and corporations—present a justiciable controversy and have standing is perhaps a matter of no great consequence. We conclude, however, that the physician-appellants, who are Georgia-licensed doctors consulted by pregnant women, also present a justiciable controversy and do have standing despite the fact that the record does not disclose that any one of them has been prosecuted, or threatened with prosecution, for violation of the State's abortion statutes. The physician is the one against whom these criminal statutes directly operate in the event he procures an abortion that does not meet the statutory exceptions and conditions. The physician-appellants, therefore, assert a sufficiently direct threat of personal detriment. They should not be required to await and undergo a criminal prosecution as the sole means of seeking relief. Crossen v. Breckenridge, 446 F. 2d 833, 839–840 (CA6 1971); Poe v. Menghini, 339 F. Supp. 986, 990–991 (Kans. 1972).

In holding that the physicians, while theoretically possessed of standing, did not present a justiciable controversy, the District Court seems to have relied primarily on Poe v. Ullman, 367 U. S. 497 (1961). There a sharply divided Court dismissed an appeal from a state court on the ground that it presented no real controversy justifying the adjudication of a constitutional issue. But the challenged Connecticut statute, deemed to prohibit the giving of medical advice on the use of contraceptives, had been enacted in 1879, and, apparently with a single exception, no one had ever been prosecuted under it. Georgia's statute, in contrast, is recent and not moribund. Furthermore, it is the successor to another Georgia abortion statute under which, we are told,[9] physicians were prosecuted. The present case, therefore, is closer to Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U. S. 97 (1968), where the Court recognized the right of a school teacher, though not yet charged criminally, to challenge her State's anti-evolution statute. See also Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U. S., at 481.

The parallel claims of the nurse, clergy, social worker, and corporation-appellants are another step removed and as to them, the Georgia statutes operate less directly. Not being licensed physicians, the nurses and the others are in no position to render medical advice. They would be reached by the abortion statutes only in their capacity as accessories or as counselor-conspirators. We conclude that we need not pass upon the status of these additional appellants in this suit, for the issues are sufficiently and adequately presented by Doe and the physician-appellants, and nothing is gained or lost by the presence or absence of the nurses, the clergymen, the social workers, and the corporations. See Roe v. Wade, ante, at ——.

IV

The appellants attack on several grounds those portions of the Georgia abortion statutes that remain after the District Court decision: undue restriction of a right to personal and marital privacy; vagueness; deprivation of substantive and procedural due process; improper restriction to Georgia residents; and denial of equal protection.

A. Roe v. Wade, ante, sets forth our conclusion that a pregnant woman does not have an absolute constitutional right to an abortion on her demand. What is said there is applicable here and need not be repeated.

B. The appellants go on to argue, however, that the present Georgia statutes must be viewed historically, that is, from the fact that prior to the 1968 Act an abortion in Georgia was not criminal if performed to "preserve the life" of the mother. It is suggested that the present statute, as well, has this emphasis on the mother's rights, not on those of the fetus. Appellants contend that it is thus clear that Georgia has given little, and certainly not first, consideration to the unborn child. Yet it is the unborn child's rights that Georgia asserts in justification of the statute. Appellants assert that this justification cannot be advanced at this late date.

Appellants then argue that the statutes do not adequately protect the woman's right. This is so because it would be physically and emotionally damaging to Doe to bring a child into her poor "fatherless" [10] family, and because advances in medicine and medical techniques have made it safer for a woman to have a medically induced abortion than for her to bear a child. Thus, "a statute which requires a woman to carry an unwanted pregnancy to term infringes not only on a fundamental right of privacy but on the right to life itself." Brief 27.

The appellants recognize that a century ago medical knowledge was not so advanced as it is today, that the techniques of antisepsis were not known, and that any abortion procedure was dangerous for the woman. To restrict the legality of the abortion to the situation where it was deemed necessary, in medical judgment, for the preservation of the woman's life was only a natural conclusion in the exercise of the legislative judgment of that time. A State is not to be reproached, however, for a past judgmental determination made in the light of then-existing medical knowledge. It is perhaps unfair to argue, as the appellants do, that because the early focus was on the preservation of the woman's life, the State's present professed interest in the protection of embryonic and fetal life is to be downgraded. That argument denies the State the right to readjust its views and emphases in the light of the advanced knowledge and techniques of the day.

C. Appellants argue that § 26–1202 (a) of the Georgia statute, as it has been left by the District Court's decision, is unconstitutionally vague. This argument centers in the proposition that, with the District Court's having stricken the statutorily specified reasons, it still remains a crime for a physician to perform an abortion except when, as § 26–1202 (a) reads, it is "based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary." The appellants contend that the word "necessary" does not warn the physician of what conduct is proscribed; that the statute is wholly without objective standards and is subject to diverse interpretation; and that doctors will choose to err on the side of caution and will be arbitrary.

The net result of the District Court's decision is that the abortion determination, so far as the physician is concerned, is made in the exercise of his professional, that is, his "best clinical" judgment in the light of all the attendant circumstances. He is not now restricted to the three situations originally specified. Instead, he may range farther afield wherever his medical judgment, properly and professionally exercised, so dictates and directs him.

The vagueness argument is set at rest by the decision in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S. 62, 71–72 (1971), where the issue was raised with respect to a District of Columbia statute making abortions criminal "unless the same were done as necessary for the preservation of the mother's life or health and under the direction of a competent licensed practitioner of medicine." That statute has been construed to bear upon psychological as well as physical well-being. This being so, the Court concluded that the term "health" presented no problem of vagueness. "Indeed, whether a particular operation is necessary for a patient's physical or mental health is a judgment that physicians are obviously called upon to make routinely whenever surgery is considered." 402 U. S., at 72. This conclusion is equally applicable here. Whether, in the words of the Georgia statute, "an abortion is necessary," is a professional judgment that the Georgia physician will be called upon to make routinely.

We agree with the District Court, 319 F. Supp., at 1058, that the medical judgment may be exercised in the light of all factors—physical, emotional, psychological, familial, and the woman's age—relevant to the well-being of the patient. All these factors may relate to health. This allows the attending physician the room he needs to make his best medical judgment. And it is room that operates for the benefit, not the disadvantage, of the pregnant woman.

D. The appellants next argue that the District Court should have declared unconstitutional three procedural demands of the Georgia statute: (1) that the abortion be performed in a hospital accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals: [11] (2) that the procedure be approved by the hospital staff abortion committee; and (3) that the performing physician's judgment be confirmed by the independent examinations of the patient by two other licensed physicians. The appellants attack these provisions not only on the ground that they unduly restrict the woman's right of privacy, but also on procedural due process and equal protection grounds. The physician-appellants also argue that, by subjecting a doctor's individual medical judgment to committee approval and to confirming consultations, the statute impermissibly restricts the physician's right to practice his profession and deprives him of due process.

1. JCAH Accreditation. The Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals is an organization without governmental sponsorship or overtones. No question whatever is raised concerning the integrity of the organization or the high purpose of the accreditation process.[12]

[11] We were advised at reargument, Tr. of Rearg. 10, that only 54 of Georgia's 159 counties have a JCAH accredited hospital.

[12] Since its founding, JCAH has pursued the "elusive goal" of defining the "optimal setting" for "quality of service in hospitals." JCAH, Accreditation Manual for Hospitals, Foreward (Dec. 1970). The Manual's Introduction states the organization's purpose to establish standards and conduct accreditation programs that will afford quality medical care "to give patients the optimal benefits that medical science has to offer." This ambitious and admirable goal is illustrated by JCAH's decision in 1966 "to raise and strengthen the

That process, however, has to do with hospital standards generally and has no present particularized concern with abortion as a medical or surgical procedure.[13] In Georgia there is no restriction of the performance of non-abortion surgery in a hospital not yet accredited by the JCAH so long as other requirements imposed by the State, such as licensing of the hospital and of the operating surgeon, are met. See Georgia Code §§ 88–1901 (a) and 88–1905 (1971) and 84–907 (Supp. 1971). Furthermore, accreditation by the Commission is not granted until a hospital has been in operation at least one year. The Model Penal Code, § 230.3, Appendix B hereto, contains no requirement for JCAH accreditation. And the Uniform Abortion Act (Final Draft, August 1971),[14] approved by the American Bar Association in February 1972, contains no JCAH accredited hospital specification.[15] Some courts have held that a JCAH accredita-standards from their present level of minimum essential to the level of optimum achievable . . . ." Some of these "optimum achievable" standards required are: disclosure of hospital ownership and control; a dietetic service and written dietetic policies; a written disaster plan for mass emergencies; a nuclear medical services program; facilities for hematology, chemistry, microbiology, clinical microscopy, and sero-immunology; a professional library and document delivery service; a radiology program; a social services plan administered by a qualified social worker; and a special care unit.

[13] "The Joint Commission neither advocates nor opposes any particular position with respect to elective abortions." Letter dated July 9, 1971, from John L. Brewer, M. D., Commissioner, JCAH, to the Rockefeller Foundation. Brief for amici, American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, et al., p. A–3.

[14] See Roe v. Wade, ante —, n. 40.

[15] Some state statutes do not have the JCAH accreditation requirement. Alaska Stat. § 11.15.060 (1970); Hawaii Rev. Stat. § 453.16 (Supp. 1971); N. Y. Penal Code § 125.05.3 (McKinney Supp. 1972–1973). Washington has the requirement but couples it with the alternative of "a medical facility approved . . . by the state board of health." Wash. Rev. Code § 9.02.070 (Supp. 1972). Florida's new statute has a similar provision. Law of Apr. 13, 1972, c.

tion requirement is an overbroad infringement of fundamental rights because it does not relate to the particular medical problems and dangers of the abortion operation. Poe v. Menghini, 339 F. Supp. 986, 993–994 (Kan. 1972); People v. Barksdale, 96 Cal. Rptr. 265, 273–274 (Cal. App. 1971).

We hold that the JCAH accreditation requirement does not withstand constitutional scrutiny in the present context. It is a requirement that simply is not "based on differences that are reasonably related to the purposes of the Act in which it is found." Morey v. Doud, 354 U. S. 457, 465 (1957).

This is not to say that Georgia may not or should not, from and after the end of the first trimester, adopt standards for licensing all facilities where abortions may be performed so long as those standards are legitimately related to the objective the State seeks to accomplish. The appellants contend that such a relationship would be lacking even in a lesser requirement that an abortion be performed in a licensed hospital, as opposed to a facility, such as a clinic, that may be required by the State to possess all the staffing and services necessary to perform an abortion safely (including those adequate to handle serious complications or other emergency, or arrangements with a nearby hospital to provide such services). Appellants and various amici have presented us with a mass of data purporting to demonstrate that some facilities other than hospitals are entirely adequate to perform abortions if they possess these qualifications.

72–196, § 1 (2). Others contain the specification. Ark. Stat. Ann. §§ 41–303 to 41–310 (Supp. 1971); Cal. Health and Safety Code §§ 25950–25955.5 (West Supp. 1972); Colo. Rev. Stats. Ann. §§ 40–2–50 to 40–2–53 (Perm. Cum. Supp. 1967); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21–3047 (Supp. 1971); Md. Ann. Code Art. 43, §§ 137–139 (Repl. 1971). Cf. Del. Code Ann. §§ 1790–1793 (Supp. 1970) specifying "a nationally recognized medical or hospital accreditation authority," § 1790 (a).

The State, on the other hand, has not presented persuasive data to show that only hospitals meet its acknowledged interest in insuring the quality of the operation and the full protection of the patient. We feel compelled to agree with appellants that the State must show more than it has in order to prove that only the full resources of a licensed hospital, rather than those of some other appropriately licensed institution, satisfy these health interests. We hold that the hospital requirement of the Georgia law, because it fails to exclude the first trimester of pregnancy, see Roe v. Wade, ante, p. —, is also invalid. In so holding we naturally express no opinion on the medical judgment involved in any particular case, that is, whether the patient's situation is such that an abortion should be performed in a hospital rather than in some other facility.

2. Committee Approval. The second aspect of the appellants' procedural attack relates to the hospital abortion committee and to the pregnant woman's asserted lack of access to that committee. Relying primarily on Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U. S. 254 (1970), concerning the termination of welfare benefits, and Wisconsin v. Constantineau, 400 U. S. 433 (1971), concerning the posting of an alcoholic's name, Doe first argues that she was denied due process because she could not make a presentation to the committee. It is not clear from the record, however, whether Doe's own consulting physician was or was not a member of the committee or did or did not present her case, or, indeed, whether she herself was or was not there. We see nothing in the Georgia statute that explicitly denies access to the committee by or on behalf of the woman. If the access point alone were involved, we would not be persuaded to strike down the committee provision on the unsupported assumption that access is not provided.

Appellants attack the discretion the statute leaves to the committee. The most concrete argument they advance is their suggestion that it is still a badge of infamy "in many minds" to bear an illegitimate child, and that the Georgia system enables the committee members' personal views as to extramarital sex relations, and punishment therefor, to govern their decisions. This approach obviously is one founded on suspicion and one that discloses a lack of confidence in the integrity of physicians. To say that physicians will be guided in their hospital committee decisions by their predilections on extramarital sex unduly narrows the issue to pregnancy outside marriage. (Doe's own situation did not involve extramarital sex and its product.) The appellants' suggestion is necessarily somewhat degrading to the conscientious physician, particularly the obstetrician, whose professional activity is concerned with the physical and mental welfare, the woes, the emotions, and the concern of his female patients. He, perhaps more than anyone else, is knowledgeable in this area of patient care, and he is aware of human frailty, so-called "error," and needs. The good physician—despite the presence of rascals in the medical profession, as in all others, we trust that most physicians are "good"—will have a sympathy and an understanding for the pregnant patient that probably is not exceeded by those who participate in other areas of professional counseling.

It is perhaps worth noting that the abortion committee has a function of its own. It is a committee of the hospital and it is composed of members of the institution's medical staff. The membership usually is a changing one. In this way its work burden is shared and is more readily accepted. The committee's function is protective. It enables the hospital appropriately to be advised that its posture and activities are in accord with legal requirements. It is to be remembered that the hospital is an entity and that it, too, has legal rights and legal obligations.

Saying all this, however, does not settle the issue of the constitutional propriety of the committee requirement. Viewing the Georgia statute as a whole, we see no constitutionally justifiable pertinence in the structure for the advance approval by the abortion committee. With regard to the protection of potential life, the medical judgment is already completed prior to the committee stage, and review by a committee once removed from diagnosis is basically redundant. We are not cited to any other surgical procedure made subject to committee approval as a matter of state criminal law. The woman's right to receive medical care in accordance with her licensed physician's best judgment and the physician's right to administer it are substantially limited by this statutorily imposed overview. And the hospital itself is otherwise fully protected. Under § 26–1202 (e) the hospital is free not to admit a patient for an abortion. It is even free not to have an abortion committee. Further, a physician or any other employee has the right to refrain, for moral or religious reasons, from participating in the abortion procedure. These provisions obviously are in the statute in order to afford appropriate protection to the individual and to the denominational hospital. Section 26–1202 (e) affords adequate protection to the hospital and little more is provided by the committee prescribed by § 26–1202 (b)(5).

We conclude that the interposition of the hospital abortion committee is unduly restrictive of the patient's rights and needs that, at this point, have already been medically delineated and substantiated by her personal physician. To ask more serves neither the hospital nor the State.

3. Two-Doctor Concurrence. The third aspects of the appellants' attack centers on the "time and availability of adequate medical facilities and personnel." It is said that the system imposes substantial and irrational roadblocks and "is patently unsuited" to prompt determination of the abortion decision. Time, of course, is critical in abortion. Risks during the first trimester of pregnancy are admittedly lower than during later months.

The appellants purport to show by a local study [16] of Grady Memorial Hospital (serving indigent residents in Fulton and DeKalb Counties) that the "mechanics of the system itself forced . . . discontinuation of the abortion process" because the median time for the workup was 15 days. The same study shows, however, that 27% of the candidates for abortion were already 13 or more weeks pregnant at the time of application, that is, they were at the end of or beyond the first trimester when they made their applications. It is too much to say, as appellants do, that these particular persons "were victims of [a] system over which they [had] no control." If higher risk was incurred because of abortions in the second rather than the first trimester, much of that risk was due to delay in application, and not to the alleged cumbersomeness of the system. We note, in passing, that appellant Doe had no delay problem herself; the decision in her case was made well within the first trimester.

It should be manifest that our rejection of the accredited hospital requirement and, more important, of the abortion committee's advance approval eliminates the major grounds of the attack based on the system's delay and the lack of facilities. There remains, however, the required confirmation by two Georgia-licensed physicians in addition to the recommendation of the pregnant woman's own consultant (making under the statute, a total of six physicians involved, including the three on the hospital's abortion committee). We conclude that this provision, too, must fall.

The statute's emphasis, as has been repetitively noted, is on the attending physician's "best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary." That should be sufficient. The reasons for the presence of the confirmation step in the statute are perhaps apparent, but they are insufficient to withstand constitutional challenge. Again, no other voluntary medical or surgical procedure for which Georgia requires confirmation by two other physicians has been cited to us. If a physician is licensed by the State, he is recognized by the State as capable of exercising acceptable clinical judgment. If he fails in this, professional censure or deprivation of his license are available remedies. Required acquiescence by co-practitioners has no rational connection with a patient's needs and unduly infringes on the physician's right to practice. The attending physician will know when a consultation is advisable—the doubtful situation, the need for assurance when the medical decision is a delicate one, and the like. Physicians have followed this routine historically and know its usefulness and benefit for all concerned. It is still true today that "[r]eliance must be placed upon the assurance given by his license, issued by an authority competent to judge in that respect, that he [the physician] possesses the requisite qualifications." Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 122–123 (1889). See United States v. Vuitch, 402 U. S., at 71.

E. The appellants attack the residency requirement of the Georgia law, §§ 26–1202 (b)(1) and (b)(2), as violative of the right to travel stressed in Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U. S. 618, 629–631 (1969), and other cases. A requirement of this kind, of course, could be deemed to have some relationship to the availability of post-procedure medical care for the aborted patient.

Nevertheless, we do not uphold the constitutionality of the residence requirement. It is not based on any policy of preserving state-supported facilities for Georgia residents, for the bar also applies to private hospitals and to privately retained physicians. There is no intimation, either, that Georgia facilities are utilized to capacity in caring for Georgia residents. Just as the Privileges and Immunities Clause, Const. Art. IV, § 2, protects persons who enter other States to ply their trade, Ward v. Maryland, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 418, 430 (1870); Blake v. McClung, 172 U. S. 239, 248–256 (1898), so must it protect persons who enter Georgia seeking the medical services that are available there. See Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U. S. 385, 396–397 (1948). A contrary holding would mean that a State could limit to its own residents the general medical care available within its borders. This we could not approve.

F. The last argument on this phase of the case is one that often is made, namely, that the Georgia system is violative of equal protection because it discriminates against the poor. The appellants do not urge that abortions should be performed by persons other than licensed physicians, so we have no argument that because the wealthy can better afford physicians, the poor should have non-physicians made available to them. The appellants acknowleged that the procedures are "nondiscriminatory in . . . express terms" but they suggest that they have produced invidious discriminations. The District Court rejected this approach out of hand. 319 F. Supp., at 1056. It rests primarily on the accreditation and approval and confirmation requirements, discussed above, and on the assertion that most of Georgia's counties have no accredited hospital. We have set aside the accreditation, approval, and confirmation requirements, however, and with that, the discrimination argument collapses in all significant aspects.

The appellants complain, finally, of the District Court's denial of injunctive relief. A like claim was made in Roe v. Wade, ante. We declined decision there insofar as injunctive relief was concerned, and we decline it here. We assume that Georgia's prosecutorial authorities will give full recognition to the judgment of this Court.

In summary, we hold that the JCAH accredited hospital provision and the requirements as to approval by the hospital abortion committee, as to confirmation by two independent physicians, and as to residence in Georgia are all violative of the Fourteenth Amendment. Specifically, the following portions of § 26–1202 (b), remaining after the District Court's judgment, are invalid:

(1) Subsections (1) and (2).

(2) That portion of Subsection (3) following the words "such physician's judgment is reduced to writing."

(3) Subsections (4) and (5).

The judgment of the District Court is modified accordingly and, as so modified, is affirmed. Costs are allowed to the appellants.

APPENDIX A

Criminal Code of Georgia

(The italicized portions are those held unconstitutional by the District Court)

CHAPTER 26–12. ABORTION.

26–1201. Criminal Abortion. Except as otherwise provided in section 26–1202, a person commits criminal abortion when he administers any medicine, drug or other substance whatever to any woman or when he uses any instrument or other means whatever upon any woman with intent to produce a miscarriage or abortion.

26–1202. Exception. (a) Section 26–1201 shall not apply to an abortion performed by a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84–9 or 84–12 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, based upon his best clinical judgment that an abortion is necessary because:

(1) A continuation of the pregnancy would endanger the life of the pregnant woman or would seriously and permanently injure her health; or

(2) The fetus would very likely be born with a grave, permanent, and irremediable mental or physical defect; or

(3) The pregnancy resulted from forcible or statutory rape.

(b) No abortion is authorized or shall be performed under this section unless each of the following conditions is met;

(1) The pregnant woman requesting the abortion certifies in writing under oath and subject to the penalties of false swearing to the physician who proposes to perform the abortion that she is a bona fide legal resident of the State of Georgia.

(2) The physician certifies that he believes the woman is a bona fide resident of this State and that he has no information which should lead him to believe otherwise.

(3) Such physician's judgment is reduced to writing and concurred in by at least two other physicians duly licensed to practice medicine and surgery pursuant to Chapter 84–9 of the Code of Georgia of 1933, as amended, who certify in writing that based upon their separate personal medical examinations of the pregnant woman, the abortion is, in their judgment, necessary because of one or more of the reasons enumerated above.

(4) Such abortion is performed in a hospital licensed by the State Board of Health and accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

(5) The performance of the abortion has been approved in advance by a committee of the medical staff of the hospital in which the operation is to be performed. This committee must be one established and maintained in accordance with the standards promulgated by the Joint Commission on the Accreditation of Hospitals, and its approval must be by a majority vote of a membership of not less than three members of the hospital's staff; the physician proposing to perform the operation may not be counted as a member of the committee for this purpose.

(6) If the proposed abortion is considered necessary because the woman has been raped, the woman makes a written statement under oath, and subject to the penalties of false swearing, of the date, time and place of the rape and the name of the rapist, if known. There must be attached to this statement a certified copy of any report of the rape made by any law enforcement officer or agency and a statement by the solicitor general of the judicial circuit where the rape occurred or allegedly occurred that, according to his best information, there is probable cause to believe that the rape did occur.

(7) Such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences are maintained in the permanent files of such hospital and are available at all reasonable times to the solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which the hospital is located.

(8) A copy of such written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences is filed with the Director of the State Department of Public Health within ten (10) days after such operation is performed.

(9) All written opinions, statements, certificates, and concurrences filed and maintained pursuant to paragraphs (7) and (8) of this subsection shall be confidential records and shall not be made available for public inspection at any time.

(c) Any solicitor general of the judicial circuit in which an abortion is to be performed under this section, or any person who would be a relative of the child within the second degree of consanguinity, may petition the superior court of the county in which the abortion is to be performed for a declaratory judgment whether the performance of such abortion would violate any constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus. Such solicitor general may also petition such court for the purpose of taking issue with compliance with the requirements of this section. The physician who proposes to perform the abortion and the pregnant woman shall be respondents. The petition shall be heard expeditiously and if the court adjudges that such abortion would violate the constitutional or other legal rights of the fetus, the court shall so declare and shall restrain the physician from performing the abortion.

(d) If an abortion is performed in compliance with this section, the death of the fetus shall not give rise to any claim for wrongful death.

(e) Nothing in this section shall require a hospital to admit any patient under the provisions hereof for the purpose of performing an abortion, nor shall any hospital be required to appoint a committee such as contemplated under subsection (b) (5). A physician, or any other person who is a member of or associated with the staff of a hospital, or any employee of a hospital in which an abortion has been authorized, who shall state in writing an objection to such abortion on moral or religious grounds shall not be required to participate in the medical procedures which will result in the abortion, and the refusal of any such person to participate therein shall not form the basis of any claim for damages on account of such refusal or for any disciplinary or recriminatory action against such person.

26–1203. Punishment. A person convicted of criminal abortion shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years.

APPENDIX B

American Law Institute

MODEL PENAL CODE

Section 230.3. Abortion.

(1) Unjustified Abortion. A person who purposely and unjustifiably terminates the pregnancy of another otherwise than by a live birth commits a felony of the third degree or, where the pregnancy has continued beyond the twenty-sixth week, a felony of the second degree.

(2) Justifiable Abortion. A licensed physician is justified in terminating a pregnancy if he believes there is substantial risk that continuance of the pregnancy would gravely impair the physical or mental health of the mother or that the child would be born with grave physical or mental defect, or that the pregnancy resulted from rape, incest, or other felonious intercourse. All illicit intercourse with a girl below the age of 16 shall be deemed felonious for purposes of this subsection. Justifiable abortions shall be performed only in a licensed hospital except in case of emergency when hospital facilities are unavailable. [Additional exceptions from the requirement of hospitalization may be incorporated here to take account of situations in sparsely settled areas where hospitals are not generally accessible.]

(3) Physicians' Certificates; Presumption from Non-Compliance. No abortion shall be performed unless two physicians, one of whom may be the person performing the abortion, shall have certified in writing the circumstances which they believe to justify the abortion. Such certificate shall be submitted before the abortion to the hospital where it is to be performed and, in the case of abortion following felonious intercourse, to the prosecuting attorney or the police. Failure to comply with any of the requirements of this Subsection gives rise to a presumption that the abortion was unjustified.

(4) Self-Abortion. A woman whose pregnancy has continued beyond the twenty-sixth week commits a felony of the third degree if she purposely terminates her own pregnancy otherwise than by a live birth, or if she uses instruments, drugs or violence upon herself for that purpose. Except as justified under Subsection (2), a person who induces or knowingly aids a woman to use instruments, drugs or violence upon herself for the purpose of terminating her pregnancy otherwise than by a live birth commits a felony of the third degree whether or not the pregnancy has continued beyond the twenty-sixth week.

(5) Pretended Abortion. A person commits a felony of the third degree if, representing that it is his purpose to perform an abortion, he does an act adapted to cause abortion in a pregnant woman although the woman is in fact not pregnant, or the actor does not believe she is. A person charged with unjustified abortion under Subsection (1) or an attempt to commit that offense may be convicted thereof upon proof of conduct prohibited by this Subsection.

(6) Distribution of Abortifacients. A person who sells, offers to sell, possesses with intent to sell, advertises, or displays for sale anything specially designed to terminate a pregnancy, or held out by the actor as useful for that purpose, commits a misdemeanor, unless:

(a) the sale, offer or display is to a physician or druggist or to an intermediary in a chain of distribution to physicians or druggists; or

(b) the sale is made upon prescription or order of a physician; or

(c) the possession is with intent to sell as authorized in paragraphs (a) and (b); or

(d) the advertising is addressed to persons named in paragraph (a) and confined to trade or professional channels not likely to reach the general public.

(7) Section Inapplicable to Prevention of Pregnancy. Nothing in this Section shall be deemed applicable to the prescription, administration or distribution of drugs or other substances for avoiding pregnancy, whether by preventing implantation of a fertilized ovum or by any other method that operates before, at or immediately after fertilization.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 70-40

Mary Doe et al., Appellants, v. Arthur K. Bolton, as Attorney General of the State of Georgia, et al.	On Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia.

[January 22, 1973]

MR. JUSTICE REHNQUIST, dissenting.

The holding in Roe v. Wade, ante, that state abortion laws can withstand constitutional scrutiny only if the States can demonstrate a compelling state interest apparently compels the Court's close scrutiny of the various provisions in Georgia's abortion statute. Since, as indicated by my dissent in Wade, I view the compelling state interest standard as an inappropriate measure of the constitutionality of state abortion laws, I respectfully dissent from the majority's holding.

v.

HENRY WADE, DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF DALLAS COUNTY, TEXAS, Appellee.

PETITION FOR REHEARING

Pursuant to Section 1 of Rule 58 of this Court, Respondent, [redacted] respectfully prays for a rehearing of the decision and judgment of the Court insofar as it declares the Texas abortion statutes unconstitutional.

Respondent urges two points as grounds for rehearing:

I.

THE SUPREME COURT ERRED IN SUBSTITUTING ITS SOCIAL BELIEFS FOR THE JUDGMENT OF THE TEXAS LEGISLATURE, WHICH SUBSTITUTION AMOUNTS TO A REVIVAL OF THE DOCTRINE OF SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS, EARLIER DISCARDED BY THE COURT IN FERGUSON V. SKRUPA, 372 U.S. 726 (1963).

The constitutional test traditionally applied by this Court to social legislation such as the Texas abortion statutes, is whether or not such laws have a "rational relation to a valid state objective." Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 491 (1955). While all may not agree with the objectives of the Texas statutes, this Court may not constitutionally substitute its judgment for the collective wisdom of the people of Texas, speaking through their legislature, unless it chooses to revive the doctrine of "substantive due process," said by this Court to have been laid to rest forever in Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726 (1963):

> "Under the system of government created by our Constitution, it is up to legislatures, not courts, to decide on the wisdom and utility of legislation. There was a time when the Due Process Clause was used by this Court to strike down laws which were thought unreasonable, that is, unwise or incompatible with some particular economic or social philosophy. In this manner the Due Process Clause was used, for example, to nullify laws prescribing maximum hours for work in bakeries, Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 25 S.Ct. 539, 49 L.Ed. 937 (1905), outlawing "yellow dog" contracts, Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1, 35 S.Ct. 240, 59 L.Ed. 441 (1915), setting minimum wages for women, Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U.S. 525, 43 S.Ct. 394, 67 L.Ed. 785 (1923), and fixing the weight of loaves of bread, Jay Burns Baking Co. v. Bryan, 264 U.S. 504, 44 S.Ct. 412, 68 L.Ed. 813 (1924). This intrusion by the judiciary into the realm of legislative value judgments was strongly objected to at the time, particularly by Mr. Justice Holmes and Mr. Justice Brandeis. Dissenting from the Court's invalidating a state statute which regulated the resale price of theatre and other tickets, Mr. Justice Holmes said,
> 'I think the proper course is to recognize that a state Legislature can do whatever it sees fit to do unless it is restrained by some express prohibition in the Constitution of the United States or of the State, and that Courts should be careful not to extend such prohibitions beyond their obvious meanings by reading into them conceptions of public policy that the particular Court may happen to entertain.'

And in an earlier case he had emphasized that, 'The criterion of constitutionality is not whether we believe the law to be for the public good.'

"The doctrine that prevailed in Lochner, Coppage, Adkins, Burns, and like cases—that due process authorizes courts to hold laws unconstitutional when they believe the legislature has acted unwisely—has long since been discarded. We have returned to the original constitutional proposition that courts do not substitute their social and economic beliefs for the judgment of legislative bodies, who are elected to pass laws. As this Court stated in a unanimous opinion in 1941, 'We are not concerned * * * with the wisdom, need, or appropriateness of the legislation.' Legislative bodies have broad scope to experiment with economic problems, and this Court does not sit to 'subject the state to an intolerable supervision hostile to the basic principles of our government and wholly beyond the protection which the general clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to secure.' It is now settled that States 'have power to legislative against what are found to be injurious practices in their internal commercial and business affairs, so long as their laws do not run afoul of some specific federal constitutional prohibition, or of some valid federal law."

The theological, philosophical, medical, and legal worlds are divided on just when the fetus can be considered to be "human." For the Court to enter the controversy and to deny that the Texas statutes have any "rational relation" to a "valid state objective" is simply to accept as rational those philosophies comporting with the Court's views, and to condemn as irrational all others.

The comments of Mr. Justice Curtis, dissenting in the Dred Scott decision, seem apropos here:

> "When such a method of interpretation of the Constitution obtains, in place of a republican government, with limited and defined powers, we have a government which is merely an exponent of the will of Congress or what, in my opinion, would not be preferable, an exponent of the individual political opinions of the members of this Court." Dred Scott v. Sanford, 60 U.S. 393, 621 (1856).

The State's abortion statutes relate logically and rationally to the State's objective—preservation of fetal human life and preservation of the mother's health. Surely the prevention of the extinguishment of the life of a human fetus, is a "valid state objective." The embryo is a fully potential human being from the moment of conception. For the Court to find a basis for its far-reaching decision in unduly narrow definitions of "person" and "life," is to avoid the basic moral and legal issue before the Court. The fetus and the mother are entitled to protection of law, in all stages of development.

The question here is not one of postponement of life, but one of the taking of life. The State's "valid objective" in trying to prevent the intentional taking of that life in all stages of development cannot be subordinated to a vaguely defined "right of privacy" or to this Court's own social and economic beliefs.

After discussing attitudes of various groups from man's dim beginnings to the present (none of which were in evidence), the Court discards all considerations except the (not unanimous) medical view that abortions performed prior to the end of the first trimester are none less dangerous than normal childbirth, so that at that time the State obtained a "compelling interest" in the pregnancy. If that single consideration is to define "compelling interest," then, presumably, as medical science continues to advance, and as the dangers of abortions—and all surgical procedures—continue to decrease, one might well find, in twenty years, that the "compelling" point has moved up to five months, or six, or seven months, or has disappeared completely.

Selection of the third trimester—being the period of "viability"—as the time during which the State may proscribe abortions, except for reasons of the mother's health, likewise has little basis in logic. To say that a State may prohibit the killing of a fetus only after the fetus has gained the ability to live outside the womb is to deny the fact that the process from conception to birth is a continuum, and that the incident of "viability" truly has no more to do with "rational relation to valid state objective" than does the appearance of a discernible heartbeat, or a host of other (early) developmental features. Few mothers or fathers, who badly wanted children, would be much consoled by the knowledge that their unwanted miscarriage had occurred in the second trimester—before "viability"—their loss is that of a human life, with the potential to be born and live outside the womb, as well as within.

II.

THE SUPREME COURT ERRED IN FAILING TO EXTEND TO UNBORN CHILDREN PROTECTION, EQUAL TO THAT OF THE MOTHER, UNDER THE EQUAL PROTECTION CLAUSE OF THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

That the fetus is "alive" from the moment of conception is not now disputed. That it is "human"—in appearance as well as potential—cannot be denied. The fetus is a "person," within the meaning of the Constitution and its Amendments, and is entitled to be protected equally with the life and health of the mother.

It has long been clear in the law that an unborn child may inherit or take under a will; that recovery may be had for injuries suffered by the unborn child prior to birth; that he may recover for the death of his father, even though that death occurs prior to the birth of the child; and that the unborn child has a host of other legal rights which would hardly be accorded a merely biological lump.

This Court cites McGarvey v. Magee-Womens Hospital, 340 F.Supp. 751 (W.D.Pa. 1972) for the proposition that a fetus is not a "person" within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. But that court saw the question before it somewhat differently (emphasis ours):

> "The narrow question is whether we will afford fetal life constitutional protection." 340 F.Supp. 751, 754.

Then, making it clear that the Court was not passing on the issue of whether a fetus is a "person," but rather passing on the issue of whether a court, instead of a legislature, should determine the question, the Court said:

> "One need not be a strict constructionist to answer this in the negative, for to answer otherwise would be to create a new administrative jungle in the name of a civil right never heretofore conceived. This is a problem for the legislatures of the various states. They must decide the problems in the light of moral issues, the conflicting rights of mother and child, the extent of medical knowledge and the interests of the state." (emphasis ours) 340 F.Supp. 751, 754.

This Court also cites Byrn v. New York City Health

& Hospitals Corp., 286 N.E.2d 887 (1972) as holding the fetus not to be a "person" within the meaning of the Constitution. But in that case, the Court of Appeals of New York, being asked to enjoin application of the New York statute allowing abortions in limited instances, stated:

> "There are, then, real issues in this litigation, but they are not legal or justiciable. They are issues outside the law unless the legislature should provide otherwise. The Constitution does not confer or require legal personality for the unborn; the legislature may, or it may do something less, as it does in limited abortion statutes, and provide some protection far short of conferring leagl personality." 286 N.E.2d 887, 890.

Clearly, that Court felt that the judgment was to be made by the legislature of the State of New York, and, having been made, should not be disturbed by the courts, on the basis of some court-imposed theory of personality.

As Mr. Justice Jasen said, concurring:

> "As Judge Breitel's opinion [the majority opinion] recognizes, the formidable task of resolving this issue is not for the courts. Rather, the extent to which fetal life should be protected 'is a value judgment not committed to the discretion of judges but reposing instead in the representative branch of government.' Corkey v. Edwards, 322 F.Supp. 1248, 1254 (D.C.N.C. 1971, appeal pending)." 286 N.E.2d 887, 891.

The other cases cited by this Court in reaching its conclusion that a fetus is not a "person" can hardly be seen as controlling on the question. Cheaney v. Indiana, 285 N.E.2d 265 (1972) merely upholds a state criminal conviction for committing an abortion. Montana v. Kennedy, 366 U.S. 308 (1961) deals merely with whether citizenship is determined by place of birth or by place of conception. Keeles v. Superior Court, 470 P.2d 617 (Cal. 1970) merely holds that an unborn, but viable, fetus is not a "human being" within the meaning of a California state statute on murder. State v. Dickinson, 275 N.E.2d 599 (Ohio 1970) deals only with whether death of a fetus might be considered "vehicular homicide," under an Ohio statute.

In short, the issue of whether a fetus is a "person," entitled to equal protection under law, has not been decided elsewhere, except where courts have (rightfully) held that that is a decision for the representative branch of government.

This Court is now squarely presented with the question, and should hold that a fetus is a "person," entitled to protection of life, under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, equal to the protection of life afforded to the mother, and to all other persons.

WHEREFORE, premises considered, Respondent moves the Court to grant the rehearing herein prayed for.

On Appeal from the United States District Court For the Northern District of Georgia

PETITION FOR REHEARING

COME NOW the Appellees herein and petition this Honorable Court for a rehearing in the above-styled cause which was decided on January 22, 1973. The reasons therefor are given below.

REASONS FOR GRANTING REHEARING

Appellees have had no opportunity to show at what gestational stage the State interest in guarding the health of the mother warrants state regulation of abortion.

The abortion techniques used today are of relatively recent origin in medical practice and are not yet widely used outside of those states which liberally allow abortions. The Court has recognized that the State has a compelling interest in the health of the mother, and it selected the end of the first trimester as the point at which the State's interest may constitutionally be implemented. The single factor which the Court used to prohibit the states, as a constitutional matter, from exercising their concern with maternal health in the first trimester of pregnancy, was the maternal mortality rate (Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18, Slip Opinion, p. 47). The pivot is the judicially recognized "fact" that "mortality in abortion is less than mortality in normal childbirth." Even if this is true, it amounts to the Court choosing sua sponte a single medical comparative gauge of which to take judicial notice, without considering whether that "fact" is a matter of common knowledge, generally known and accepted, and without taking into account other medical and scientific facts which may justify State regulation of abortion or even cast a duty on the State to circumscribe such procedures for the health, safety, and welfare of pregnant women.

The point is that the Appellees had no opportunity at any stage in this case to present evidence which would show that the State's regulatory scheme regarding abortion is reasonably related to, and even demanded by hazards to, maternal health in the first trimester. The mortality rate is not the only significant factor in assuring protection of maternal health. Just as the Court found too narrow the allowance of abortions to preserve the mother's "life" and ruled that her health also be served in the abortion decision, so the Court has overlooked the State's concern with her health both within the early stages of pregnancy and afterwards as she experiences the results of first trimester abortion; in these regards the State is concerned with a great deal more than just whether she lives or dies as a direct and immediate result of abortion. Hence, the exclusive emphasis on mortality constricts the legitimate arena of State concern with maternal health to the question only of life and death.

For example, Appellees should have the right to show that the State can require abortions to be done in a safe setting and to prescribe the location in terms of what is desirable to protect the patient, over and above what a lone doctor feels is adequate or expeditious. We are dealing here with a procedure long considered outlawed and which has suddenly become legal. Complications both immediate and long term are highly speculative, and the need for post-care availability is often unforeseen and unforeseeable. Later complications and the effects on the physical and mental well-being of the pregnant woman who undergoes an abortion procedure will not be known absent enforceable reporting procedures. Secondly, they will be beyond the State's reach to safeguard against if the State is constitutionally forbidden from restricting early-term abortions but for the minimal requirement that they be done by physicians.

The record is devoid of evidence as to what is justifiable in this respect, as to what is "reasonably related" to the compelling state interest recognized by the Court and contemporaneously captured in the Court's judicial concept of medical wisdom and knowledge.

Appellees have had no opportunity to show by evidence in a traditional judicial trial setting at what gestational stage the separate life of the fetus is "meaningful" medically; in addition, the Court overlooked the significance of Georgia's legal recognition of meaningful human life as found in case law and statute.

The Court has taken judicial notice of innumerable facts and factors, some which are expressly referred to in the Court's decision and some which are unknown to the parties but which apparently were extricated from various sources by the Court's diligent research, which facts nevertheless should be subject to refutation and counter-evidence since they form the foundation for the Court's opinion and compromising dichotomy of constitutional stages of fetal growth. With no opportunity for Appellees to demonstrate the factual basis, in terms of current medical science, that its interest attaches at a particular point in the natural development of a human fetus, the Court has seized upon the convenient point of "viability" and crystallized constitutional command which bars State action.

The Constitution does not prohibit the State from exerting the power to protect rights retained by the people, that is, the right to determine for legal purposes what is a "person" insofar as the gray area of prenatal life is concerned. Nor does it prohibit the State from determining at what degree a living human entity may be protected on behalf of itself and of society.

Basic rights are the original and inviolate property of the people, flowing from natural law, whereas constitutions are only the mechanical means of organizing a government and thus merely guarantee and recognize such fundamental rights. The right of a living human fetus to develop to birth, which right cannot be said to attach constitutionally no sooner than "viability" as that term is judicially defined, is a natural right which exists even without a Constitution.

The Court has recognized that fetal life is a continuum. Thus before a point is selected at which our government by judicial fiat must be blindfolded to its existence, the Court should have every benefit of a complete record and the representation by a guardian ad litem for that fetal entity and for its natural right to develop to birth. The presumption in this regard should be on the side of life so that its fullest defenses may be aired.

What the Court has done is to compel the State to condone the killing of prenatal infants and even to encourage it by loose controls. The Court, but not the Constitution, compels the State to denounce the fetus for what it is, despite the legal status and recognition which the State accords to the prenatal infant in a wide variety of laws which conceive of a child en ventre sa mere as a child in esse.

The Court has adjudged that the State can protect the human fetus only when it "presumably has the capability of meaningful life outside the mother's womb." Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18, Slip Opinion p. 48. Medically, however, the fetus may be a patient whose life is sought to be saved at a point far earlier than "viability" and indeed, from the time his existence in the mother's womb is known. The separate human entity is protectible from the earliest knowledge of pregnancy, by treatment to the fetus-harboring female so as to make her pregnancy as durable as possible.[1] The Court has selected a point in time at which states may protect fetal life, without any record of facts upon which to base the conclusion that only at "viability", as that term is defined by the Court, do the people of a state have the authority to demand caution before a prenatal infant is destroyed. Not only did the Court set a new constitutional standard, but at the same moment the Court applied the standard without giving Appellees notice or an opportunity to present evidence with respect to the point of gestation at which such standards, if they be correct as a matter of law in the first place, should be applied. "Viability", "meaningful life" or existence, "fetal life": all presumably have medical meaning which should be subject to medical testimony before a decision of constitutional import becomes solidified in concrete. These concepts are not even necessarily the appropriate ones. Without medical testimony, for example, the Court abandoned the concept of "quickening" as being a valid point of recognition of the fetus as a separate and protectible entity.[2]

The Court's phrase "potential human life" should also be subject to medical scrutiny if it is to have a judicial meaning in medical spheres. In the medical concept of "life", with its current body of technological knowledge,

[1] See Ratner, "Fetology: the Smallest Patients", Vol. 8, No. 2, Child and Family Quarterly (Oak Park, Illinois), reprint of article in "The Sciences" October 1968, New York Academy of Sciences.

[2] Mr. Justice Douglas would apparently recognize this earlier event. In speaking of the "rightful concern of society," he stated in his concurring opinion that: "The woman's health is part of that concern; as is the life of the fetus after quickening." Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18, and Doe v. Bolton, No. 70-40, concurring opinion p. 7.

including such advances as fetal electrocardiography and fetal electroencephalography, legal "life" should not be cemented at an event in a judicial conclusion which does not have the benefit of medical evidence. The "potential human life" concept is questionable, for example, because the healthy first trimester fetus has a high probability of birth rather than merely a "potentiality."

In this regard, the records in some of the other cases pending before the Court may have more complete records which shed greater light on this momentous question than does the meager record in the instant case, made by a solitary hearing of less than three hours duration. See, e.g., Abele v. Markle, 342 F.Supp. 800 (Conn. 1972), appeal pending; Abele v. Markle, ____ F.Supp. ____ (Conn. Sept. 20, 1972), appeal pending.

In addition, Georgia's recognition of meaningful life has already been legally determined to attach far earlier than the Court-established "viability" of twenty-four weeks or twenty-eight weeks. An example is the case of Garrett v. State, 125 Ga. App. 743 (1972), wherein the court upheld a judgment granting weekly child support for an unborn child, separate and apart from a lump sum payment to the pregnant wife. The court discussed the defendant's obligation to support his children. Illustrative also is the legal definition in Georgia of a "live birth", which birth requires a certificate of birth registration:

> "The complete expulsion or extraction from its mother of a product of human conception, irrespective of the duration of pregnancy, which, after such expulsion or extraction, breathes or shows any other evidence of life such as beating of the heart, pulsation > of the umbilical cord, or definite movement of voluntary muscles, whether or not the umbilical cord has been cut or the placenta is attached." Ga.L. 1964, pp. 499, 581, 584 (Ga. Code Ann. § 88-1702[e]; § 88-1709[a]).

This is obviously not related only to a point exceeding "viability". See also the examples referred to in Appellees' Brief, pp. 62-65, and in Appellees' list of "Late Authorities", pp. 2-3.

At any rate, the Appellees should have an opportunity to present evidence and testimony to support the State's claim of medically and scientifically sound interest in requiring a cautious approach to the extinguishment of fetal life.

"Person" is not defined in the United States Constitution, which this Court has repeatedly recognized as a dynamic document. In Shadwick v. Tampa, 407 U.S. 345 (1972), Mr. Justice Powell stated:

> "But our federal system warns of converting desirable practices into constitutional commandments. It recognizes in plural and diverse state activity one key to national innovativeness and vitality." Id. at 353-354.

Medical technology and biological knowledge have advanced far beyond that which existed when the Constitution was written. The Constitution did not freeze into 1789 concepts the meaning of "person" or the stage at which the people might be persuaded to protect fetal life.

The Court has overlooked the State's compelling interest in protecting the dignity of human life, which is separate and apart from the interest in protecting the individual fetus. The State has a compelling interest as part of its police power to uphold and bear witness to the moral fiber of its citizenry. As Oliver Wendell Holmes is reported to have said:

> "The law is the witness and external deposit of our moral life."[1]

The Court here made a value judgment which should be left to the people through their duly elected representatives or even, where they so choose, through referendum. The interest in protecting the concept of the sacredness of human life and the natural rights which follow its emergence, underlies the interest in protecting fetal life and is at the root of the State's expressed desire to curb killing. This fundamental consideration is the basis for the conservative system of checks and the multiple consideration of the abortion decision which the Georgia statutory scheme envisioned, because it recognized that medicine was not here dealing with an appendix or other part of a person's body but rather with a separate and to a great degree independent human entity.

The concept that the entity was a part of the mother was long ago abandoned by science; it is undeniable that the entity is merely harbored in the mother who carries it. Certainly it is dependent on her, but dependence is relative and cannot be used to measure the value of human life nor to determine when "life" begins. A born infant, for example, is utterly dependent and would die if not cared for. Our astronauts would similarly die if not tied by their "umbilical cord" to the life-sustaining moonship or oxygen supply. Each individual needs a particular type of environment for its existence, and the unborn infant needs the environment supplied by the mother's womb (or an artificial womb when that becomes available), and this need should not be required to subordinate the living fetus in all cases where the mother's broadly defined "health" is involved.

The people of the State of Georgia have made a value judgment based on medical and other scientific facts as well as a number of other legitimate factors which relate to the concept of human life. The State has balanced the interest of the non-wanting pregnant mother and the natural rights of the human fetus whose dependence may find a substitute at birth, and has through its legislation achieved a balance which gives credence and standing to both, in a humane and entirely workable scheme. The interest of the State in protecting maternal mental and physical health and life, and on the other hand its interest in protecting existing human fetuses who are within the realm of legitimate control, have been struck in a delicate balance which takes into account not only abortion laws but also adoption laws, child care laws, public health capabilities, etc. The Court's substituted value judgment should not, therefore, be foisted upon the people of the State without an opportunity at least to give evidence of the factual basis supporting their legislative efforts to strike the balance as they have done.

The decision fails to allow the State to acknowledge the interests of the unborn fetus at any stage before birth.

The Court stated that the interest of the State in protecting fetal life is lawful at and after "viability." But the qualifier swallows up the concession and renders it substantially identical to the unregulated decision in the first trimester. The Court announced that:

> "If the State is interested in protecting fetal life after viability, it may go so far as to proscribe abortion during that period except when it is necessary to preserve the life or health of the mother." Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18, Slip Opinion, p. 48.

The "health" of the mother comports a broad spectrum of considerations, as the Court adopted the many-faceted approach of the District Court and related it to the wide concept of "health" approved in United States v. Vuitch, 402 U.S. 62, 71-72 (1971). (See Doe v. Bolton, No. 70-40, Slip Opinion p. 11). Consequently, the 38-week-old fetus, who could live outside of his mother's womb without so much as the aid of an incubator, may be destroyed if his mother's mental health would better be "preserved" without the "psychological" experience of childbirth or the "distress" associated with an "unwanted" child. (See Roe v. Wade, No. 70-18, Slip Opinion, p. 38). Not only does this completely avoid the alternative of adoption, it demonstrates the overbroad restriction which the Court's mandate fixes on the State. Because of the all-consuming exception, the unborn "viable" child is no better off, as a matter of law, than the first-trimester child who can be aborted if his mother's physician deems that it is necessary for her, in his best clinical judgment. She, being the sole patient with whom he is concerned, will be hard put to find that her "health" will not in some measure be affected if her desire to abort is not fulfilled.

The dilemma posed by this conflict should be resolved upon rehearing or remand.

CONCLUSION

For any or all of the reasons stated, this Petition for Rehearing should be granted, or the opinion should be withdrawn until the Court has fully examined those cases pending before it which come with more complete factual records, or the case should be remanded for the taking of evidence in light of the Court's views.

BRIEF OF AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF PETITION FOR REHEARING

INTEREST OF AMICUS CURIAE

Since the law of the Commonwealth of Virginia relating to abortions parallels the provisions of the Georgia statute struck down in Doe v. Bolton, ..... U.S. ..... (1973), the issues presented in that case and in Roe v. Wade, ..... U.S. ..... (1973), are of great importance to the people of Virginia.

ARGUMENT

The principle of separation of powers is fundamental to the very existence of constitutional government as established in the United States. The unique place and character of judicial review in our governmental framework are found in the "delicacy of that function, particularly in view of possible consequences for others . . .; the comparative finality of those consequences; the consideration due to the judgment of other repositories of constitutional power concerning the scope of their authority; the necessity, if government is to function constitutionally, for each to keep within its power, including the courts; the inherent limitations of the judicial process . . .; withal in the paramount importance of constitutional adjudication in our system." Rescue Army v. Municipal Court of Los Angeles, 331 U.S. 549, 571 (1947).

In deciding Roe v. Wade, ..... U.S. ..... (1973), the Court recognized at page 1 and page 44 of the slip opinion the "sensitive and emotional nature of the abortion controversy," the "vigorous opposing views, even among physicians," the "deep and seemingly absolute convictions that the subject inspires," and the wide divergence of opinion on the "difficult question of when life begins." Nevertheless, as Mr. Justice Holmes stated in his now famous dissent in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 75 (1905):

> "This case is decided upon [a] . . . theory which a large part of the country does not entertain. If it were a question whether I agreed with that theory, I should desire to study it further and long before making up > my mind. But I do not conceive that to be my duty, because I strongly believe that my agreement or disagreement has nothing to do with the right of a majority to embody their opinions in law. It is settled by various decisions of this court that state constitutions and state laws may regulate life in many ways which we as legislators might think as injudicious or if you like as tyrannical as this, and which equally with this interfere with the liberty to contract. . . . The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Mr. Herbert Spencer's Social Statics."

It is not the function of the Supreme Court of the United States under the authority of the Fourteenth Amendment to supervise the legislation of the States in the exercise of the police power beyond protecting against exertions of such authority in the enactment and enforcement of laws of an arbitrary character, having no reasonable relation to the execution of lawful purposes. Jones v. City of Portland, 245 U.S. 217, 224 (1917). And as Mr. Justice Rehnquist recognized on page 4 of the slip opinion in his dissent in Roe, "adoption of the compelling state interest standard will inevitably require the Court to examine the legislative policies and pass on the wisdom of these policies in the very process of deciding whether a particular state interest put forward is 'compelling.' The decision here to break the term of pregnancy into three distinct terms and to outline the permissible restrictions the state may impose in each one, . . . , partakes more of judicial legislation than it does of a determination of the intent of the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment."

Neither the Fourteenth Amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its "police power," to prescribe reasonable regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education and good order of the people. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U.S. 27, 31 (1885). This power is one of the least limitable of the powers of government. Queenside Hills Realty Co. v. Saxl, 328 U.S. 80, 83 (1945). No better words can be used to describe the concept of the police power of the State, than selected passages from the case of Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U.S. 11, 24-26 (1905), in which the Court upheld the validity of the Massachusetts statute requiring vaccination against smallpox:

> "The authority of the State to enact this statute is to be referred to what is commonly called the police power —a power which the State did not surrender when becoming a member of the Union under the Constitution. . . . According to settled principles the police power of a State must be held to embrace, at least, such reasonable regulations established directly by legislative enactment as will protect the public health and the public safety. . . . The mode or manner in which those results are to be accomplished is within the discretion of the State; . . . [T]he liberty secured by the Constitution of the United States to every person within its jurisdiction does not import an absolute right in each person to be, at all times and in all circumstances, wholly freed from restraint. . . . This court has more than once recognized it as a fundamental principle that 'persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State. . . .' " (Citations omitted.)

The Court's holdings in Roe, supra, and its companion case, Doe v. Bolton, ..... U.S. ..... (1973), are an unprecedented and unwarranted intrusion by the judiciary into the power and responsibility of the legislature to protect the public health, safety, welfare and morals of its citizens. The Court's decisions in these cases precludes the State from adopting a theory of life which a substantial number of its citizens accepts. Contrary to Mr. Justice Holmes' admonition, the Court has adopted the socio-medical-legal theory that "life" is too insubstantial to allow the State under the Constitution to grant protection from arbitrary destruction visited upon embryonic life prior to the time of viability. "[A] legitimate state interest in this area need not stand or fall on acceptance of the belief that life begins at conception or at some other point prior to live birth. In assessing the State's interest, recognition may be given to the less rigid claim that as long as at least potential life is involved, the State may assert interests beyond the protection of the pregnant woman alone." Roe, supra, at 35 (slip opinion). Moreover, it is "unfair to argue that because the early focus was on preservation of the woman's life, the State's present professed interest in the protection of embryonic and fetal life is to be downgraded. That argument denies the State the right to readjust its views and emphases in the light of the advanced knowledge and techniques of the day." Doe, supra, at 10 (slip opinion).

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Commonwealth of Virginia, respectfully submits that this Court should grant appellees petitions for rehearing in the cases of Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton, decided January 22, 1973.

BRIEF OF STATE OF CONNECTICUT, AMICUS CURIAE, IN SUPPORT OF PETITIONS FOR REHEARING FILED BY THE STATES OF GEORGIA and TEXAS

The State of Connecticut, as Amicus Curia, pursuant to Rule 42 of the Revised Rules of the United States Supreme Court, joins with the States of Georgia and Texas in support of their petitions for rehearing which are to be filed by February 16, 1973 and respectfully urges its favorable consideration on the following grounds:

1. The Attorney General and State's Attorneys of Connecticut are Appellants in appeals involving related issues concerning the constitutionality of state anti-abortion laws. Markle v. Abele, No. 72-56 and 72-730, docketed July 10, 1972 and November 16, 1972, respectively.

2. The Connecticut case (No. 72-730) is believed to be the only one involving the constitutional issue of abortion wherein an evidentiary record has been made.

3. The evidence in the Connecticut case demonstrates that an unborn child is an alive, separate and distinct human being from the time the child is conceived.

4. This evidence was wholly uncontradicted.

5. The evidence included cases where a number of "previable" children were delivered alive as a result of induced abortion in New York City and then died.

6. The evidence also included at least one case where a child was delivered as a result of induced abortion and survived.

7. Your Amicus respectfully urges that this evidence may be of great assistance to the Court in resolving the question of when human life begins from the standpoint of medical science.

8. Evidence that there is a substantial margin of error in ascertaining a length of pregnancy is also in the record. In New York City there have been many abortions performed beyond the statutory limit of gestation.

9. Evidence as to unreported complications and deaths resulting from legalized abortion in New York City was also presented.

10. Your Amicus respectfully submits that the method of judicial notice taken in the Georgia and Texas cases wherein no evidentiary record was made may not be appropriate in a case such as Connecticut's where there is a record of medical evidence.

11. The instant cases in which the petitions for rehearing have been filed are of great public moment. Your Amicus respectfully submits that it is essential that the judgments therein be based upon scientific evidence which has not yet been presented to this Court.

WHEREFORE, your Amicus respectfully urges this Court to grant the petitions filed by the States of Georgia and Texas for rehearing those cases and any other cases that are similarly situated. They respectfully submit that the ends of justice would best be served in such a rehearing by proceeding on the basis of plenary hearing in the Connecticut case where there is a record which speaks for itself.

Dated at Hartford, Connecticut, this 15th day of February, A.D., 1973.

Respectfully submitted,
